[illegible]

of battle, the thirst for glory, the sense of honour, the glory, self-devotion, generosity, grandeur of soul; the life of the Vaishya, — trade, industry, thrift, prosperity, benevolence, philanthropy; the life of the Sudra, — honesty, simplicity, labour, religious and quiet service to the nation even in the humblest position and the most insignificant kind of work. The cause of India's decline was the gradual disappearance of the Kshatriya and the dwindling of the Vaishya. The modern political history of India since the discovery of the Nandal has been an attempt to regenerate or replace the Kshatriya. But the attempt was only partially successful. The British held dominion for a long time, indeed, until the British advent by which he has almost been extinguished. When the chaturvarna disappears, there comes a confusion of the great brahman which keeps a nation vigorous and sound. The Kshatriya dwindled, the Vaishya imitated the Brahmin and the Sudra were left. The inevitable tendency was for the Brahmin type to disappear and the first sign of its disappearance was utter degeneracy. The tendency to lose himself and while keeping some outward signs of his Brahmin to gravitate towards the Brahmin. In the Kalidasa the Sudra is powerful and attracts into himself the less vigorous Brahmin, as the earth attracts pure but smaller bodies, and the Brahmin the spiritual force, of the latter, grows diminished, dwindles to nothingness. For the Satyayuga to return we must get back the Brahmin (and more in general). The Brahmin is the basis of all the rest and in the Satyayuga all men have it more or less and by it the nation lives and is great.

has to be translated into modern European terms before they can understand it. For it is the European ideas alone that are real to them and the great truths of Indian thought seem to them mere metaphors, allegories and mystic parables. So well has British education done its fatal denationalising work in India.

The Brahmin stands for religion, science, scholarship, and the higher morality; the Kshatriya for war, politics and administration; the Vaishya for the trades, professions and industries; the Sudra for labour and service. It is only when these four departments of human activity are all in a robust and flourishing condition that the nation is sound and great. When any of these disappear or suffer, it is bad for the body politic. And the two highest are the least easy to be spared. If they survive in full strength, they can provide themselves with the two others, but if either the Kshatriya or the Brahmin go, if either the political force or the spiritual force of a nation is lost, that nation is doomed unless it can revive or replace the missing strength. And of the two the Brahmin is the most important. He can always create the Kshatriya; spiritual force can always raise up material force to defend it. But if the Brahmin becomes the Sudra, if the lower instinct of the herd and the brute becomes all in all, the instinct to serve and seek a living as one supreme object of life, the instinct to accept safety as a compensation for past greatness and inglorious ease and dependence in place of the ardours of high aspiration for the nation and the individual. When spirituality is lost, all is lost. This is the fate from which we have narrowly escaped by the re-emergence of the soul of India in Nationalism.

But that re-emergence is not yet complete. There is the great fault of Indian Nationalism, it is not yet a ize. There is a vague idea, there is no definite conception or deep insight. We have yet to know ourselves, what we were, are and may be; what we did in the past and what we are capable of doing in the future; our history and our mission. This is the first and most important work which the Karmayogin sets for itself, to popularize this knowledge. The Vedanta or Sufism, the temple or the mosque, Nanak and Kabir and Ramadas, Chaitanya or Guru Govinda, Brahmin and Kayastha and Namiasudra, whatever national asset we have indigenous or acclimated, it will seek to make known, to put in its right place and appreciate. And the second thing is how to use these assets so as to swell the sum of national life and produce the future. It is easy to appraise their relations to the past, it is more difficult to give them their place in the future. The third thing is to know the outside world and its relation to us and how to deal with it. That is the problem which we find at present the most difficult and insistent but its solution depends on the solution of the others.

We have said that Brahmatva is the thing we need most of all and first of all. In one sense, that means the pre-eminence of religion; but after all, what the Europeans mean by religion is not Brahmatva; which is rather spirituality, the force and energy of thought and action arising from communion with or self-surrender to that with us which rules the world. In that sense we shall use it. This force and energy can be directed to any purpose God desires for us; it is sufficient to knowledge, love or service; it is good for the liberation of an individual soul, the building of a nation or the turning of a tool. It works from within, it works in the power of God, it works with superhuman energy. The reawakening of that force in three hundred millions of men by the means which our past has placed in our hands, that is our object.

The European is proud of his success in divorcing religion from life. Religion, he says, is all very well in its place, but it has nothing to do with politics or science or commerce, which it spoils by its intrusion; it is meant only for Sundays when, if one is English, one puts on black clothes and tries to feel good, and if one is continental, one puts the rest of the week away and amuses oneself. In reality, the European has not succeeded in getting rid of religion from his life. It is coming back in socialism, in the Anarchism of Bakunin and Tolstoi, in many other forms; and in whatever form it comes, it insists on engrossing the whole life, of moulding the whole of society and politics under the law of idealistic aspiration. It does not use the word God or grasp the idea, but it sees God in humanity. What the European understood by religion, had to be got rid of and put out of life, but real religion, spirituality, idealism, altruism, self-devotion, the hunger after perfection, is the whole destiny of humanity and cannot be got rid of. After all God does exist and if He exists, you cannot shove Him into a corner and say "That is your place and as for the world and life it belongs to us." He pervades and returns. Every age of denial is only a preparation for a larger and more comprehensive affirmation.

The Karmayogin will be more of a national review than a weekly newspaper. We shall notice current events only as they evidence, help, affect or resist the growth of national life and the development of the soul of the nation. Political and social problems we shall deal with from this standpoint, seeking first their spiritual roots and inner causes and then proceeding to measures and remedies. In a similar spirit we shall deal with all sources of national strength in the past and in the present, seeking to bring them home to all comprehensions and make them applicable to our life, dynamic and not static, creative and not merely preservative. For if there is no creation, there must be disintegration; if there is no advance and victory, there must be recoil and defeat.

THE IDEAL OF THE KARMAYOGIN.

A nation is building in India to-day before the eyes of the world so swiftly, so palpably that all can watch the process and those who have sympathy and intuition distinguish the forces at work, the materials in use, the lines of the divine architecture. This nation is not a new race raw from the workshop of Nature or created by modern circumstances. One of the oldest races and greatest civilisations on this earth, the most indomitable in vitality, the most fecund in greatness, the deepest in life, the most wonderful in potentiality, after taking into itself numerous sources of strength from foreign strains of blood and other types of human energy, is now seeking to lift itself for good into an organised national unity. Formerly a congeries of kindred nations with a single life and a single culture, always by the law of this essential oneness tending to unity, always by its excess of fecundity engendering fresh diversities and divisions, it has never yet been able to overcome permanently the almost insuperable obstacles to the organization of a continent. The time has now come when those obstacles can be overcome. The attempt which our race has been making throughout its long history, it will now make under entirely new circumstances. A keen observer would predict its success because the only important obstacles have been or are in the process of being removed. But we go farther and believe that it is sure to succeed because the freedom, unity and greatness of India have now become necessary to the world. This is the faith in which the Karmayogin puts its hand to the work and will persist in it, refusing to be discouraged by difficulties however immense and apparently insuperable. We believe that God is with us and in that faith we shall conquer. We believe that humanity needs us and it is the love and service of humanity, of our country, of the race, of our religion that will purify our hearts and inspire our action in the struggle.

The task we set before ourselves is not mechanical but moral and spiritual. We aim not at the alteration of a form of government but at the building up of a nation. Of that task politics is a part, but only a part. We shall devote ourselves not to politics alone, nor to social questions alone, nor to theology or philosophy or literature or science by themselves, but we include all these in one entity which we believe to be all-important, the dharma, the national religion, which we also believe to be universal. There is a mighty law of life, a great principle of human evolution, a body of spiritual knowledge and experience of which India has always been destined to be the guardian, the exemplar and missionary. This is the sadharma, the eternal religion. Under the stress of alien impacts she has largely lost hold not of the structure of that dharma, but of its living reality. For the religion of India is nothing if it is not lived. It has to be applied not only to life, but to the whole of life; its spirit has to enter into and mould our society, our politics, our literature, our science, our individual character, affections and aspirations. To understand the heart of this dharma, to experience it as a truth, to feel the high emotions to which it rises and to express and execute it in life is what we understand by Karmayoga. We believe that it is to make the yoga the ideal of human life that India rises to-day; by the yoga she will get the strength to realise her freedom, unity and greatness, by the yoga she will keep the strength to preserve it. It is a spiritual revolution we foresee and the material is only its shadow and reflex.

The European sets great store by machinery. He seeks to renovate humanity by schemes of society and systems of government; he hopes to bring about the millennium by an act of Parliament. Machinery is of great importance, but only as a working means for the spirit within, the force behind. The nineteenth century in India aspired to political emancipation, social renovation, religious vision and rebirth, but it failed because it adopted Western motives and methods, ignored the spirit, history and destiny of our race and thought that by taking over European education, European machinery, European organization and equipment we should reproduce in ourselves European prosperity, energy and progress. We of the twentieth century reject the aims, ideals and methods of the Anglicised nineteenth precisely because we accept its experience. We refuse to make an idol of the present; we look before and after, backward to the mighty history of our race, forward to the grandiose history for which that destiny has prepared it.

We do not believe that our political salvation can be attained by enlargements of Councils, introductions of the elective principle, colonial self-government or any other formula of European politics. We do not deny the use of some of these things as instruments, as weapons in a political struggle, but we deny their sufficiency whether as instruments or ideals and look beyond to an end which they do not serve except in a trifling degree. They might be sufficient if it were our ultimate destiny to be an outlying province of the British Empire or a dependent adjunct of European civilisation. That is a future which we do not think it worth making any sacrifice to accomplish. We believe on the other hand, that India is destined to work out her own independent life and civilisation, to stand in the forefront of the world and solve the political, social, economical and moral problems which Europe has failed to solve, yet the pursuit of which and the feverish passage in that pursuit from experiment to experiment, from failure to failure she calls her progress. Our means must be as great as our ends and the strength to discover and use the means so as to attain the end can only be found by seeking the eternal source of strength in ourselves.

We do not believe that by changing the machinery so as to make our society the ape of Europe we shall effect social renovation. Widow-remarriage, substitution of class for caste, adult marriage, intermarriages, interdining and the other nostrums of the social reformer are mechanical changes which, whatever their merits or demerits, cannot by themselves save the soul of the nation alive or stay the course of degradation and decline. It is the spirit alone that saves, and only by becoming great and free in heart can we become socially and politically great and free.

We do not believe that by multiplying new sects limited within the narrower and inferior ideas of religion imported from the West or by creating organizations for the perpetuation of the mere dress and body of Hinduism we can recover our spiritual health, energy and greatness. The world moves through an indispensable interregnum of freethought and materialism to a new synthesis of religious thought and experience, a new religious world—life free from intolerance, yet full of faith and fervour, accepting all forms of religion because it has an unshakeable faith in the One. The religion which embraces Science and faith, Theism, Christianity, Mahomedanism and Buddhism and yet is none of these, is that to which the World-Spirit moves. In our own, which is the most sceptical and the most believing of all, the most sceptical because it has questioned and experimented the most, the most believing because it has the deepest experience and the most varied and positive spiritual knowledge,—that wider Hinduism which is not a dogma or combination of dogmas but a law of life, which is not a social framework but the spirit of a past and future social evolution, which rejects nothing but insists on testing and experiencing everything and when tested and experienced turning it to the soul's uses, in this Hinduism we find the basis of the future world-religion. This sanatana dharma has many scriptures, Veda, Vedanta, Gita, Upanishad, Darshana, Puran, Tantra, nor could it reject the Bible or the Koran; but its real, most authoritative Scripture is in the heart in which the Eternal has His dwelling. It is in our inner spiritual experiences that we shall find the proof and source of the world's Scriptures, the law of knowledge, love and conduct, the basis and inspiration of Karmayoga.

Our aim will therefore be to help in building up India for the sake of humanity,—this is the spirit of the Nationalism which we profess and follow. We say to humanity, "The time has come when you must take the great step and rise out of a material existence into the higher deeper and wider life towards which humanity moves. The problems, which have troubled mankind can only be solved by conquering the kingdom within, not by harnessing the forces of Nature to the service of comfort and luxury, but by mastering the forces of the intellect and the spirit, by vindicating the freedom of man within as well as without and by conquering from within external Nature. For that work the resurgence of Asia is necessary, therefore Asia rises. For that work the freedom and greatness of India is essential, therefore she claims her destined freedom and greatness, and it is to the interest of all humanity, not excluding England, that she should wholly establish her claim."

We say to the nation, "It is God's will that we should be ourselves and not Europe. We have sought to regain life by following the law of another being than our own. We must return and seek the sources of life and strength within ourselves. We must know our past and recover it for the purposes of our future. Our business is to realise ourselves first and to mould everything to the law of India's eternal life and nature. It will therefore be the object of the Karmayogin to read the heart of our religion, our society, our philosophy, politics, literature, art, jurisprudence, science, thought, everything that was and is ours, so that we may be able to say to ourselves and our nation, "This is our dharma." We shall review European civilisation entirely from the standpoint of Indian thought and knowledge and seek to throw off from us the dominating stamp of the Occident; what we have to take from the West we shall take as Indians. And the dharma once discovered we shall strive our utmost not only to profess but to live, in our individual actions, in our social life, in our political endeavours."

We say to the individual and especially to the young who are now arising to do India's work, the world's work, God's work. "You cannot cherish these ideals, still less can you fulfil them if you subject your minds to European ideas or look at life from the material standpoint. Materially you are nothing, spiritually you are everything. It is only the Indian who can believe every thing, dare everything, sacrifice everything. First therefore become Indians. Recover the patrimony of your fore-fathers. Recover the Aryan thought, the Aryan discipline, the Aryan character, the Aryan life. Recover the Vedanta, the Gita, the Yoga. Recover them not only in intellect or sentiment but in your lives. Live them and you will be great and strong, mighty, invincible and fearless. Neither life nor death will have any terrors for you. Difficulty and impossibility will vanish from your vocabularies. For it is in the spirit that strength is eternal and you must win back the kingdom of yourselves, the inner Swaraj, before you can win back your outer empire. There the Mother dwells and she waits for worship that she may give strength. Believe in Her, serve Her, lose your wills in Hers, your egoism in the greater ego of the country, your separate selfishness in the service of humanity. Recover the source of all strength in yourselves and all else will be added to you, social soundness, intellectual preeminence, political freedom, the mastery of human thought, the hegemony of the world."

KARMAYOGA.

We have spoken of Karmayoga as the application of Vedanta and Yoga to life. To many who take their knowledge of Hinduism secondhand this may seem a doubtful definition. It is ordinarily supposed by "practical" minds that Vedanta as a guide to life and Yoga as a method of spiritual communion are dangerous things which lead men away from action to abstraction. We leave aside those who regard all such beliefs as mysticism, self-delusion or imposture, but even those who reverence and believe in the high thing of Hinduism have the impression that one must remove oneself from a full human activity in order to live the spiritual life. Yet the spiritual life finds its most potent expression in the man who lives the ordinary life of men in the strength of the Yoga and under the discipline of Vedanta. It is by such an inner life and the outer life that the world is eventually to be lifted up to the divine. It is by such an inner life that Vedanta can be applied to life, no rule of conduct is purely metaphysical and purely metaphysical, on the contrary, the highest law of life is the law of action. It is by such an inner life that the world is lifted up to the divine.

justification in the teachings of the Upanishads and the Gita. The characteristic doctrines of the Gita are nothing if they are not a law of life, a dharm, and even the most transcendental aspirations of the Vedanta presuppose a preparation in life, for it is only through life that one can reach to immortality. The opposite opinion is due to certain tendencies which have talked large in the history and temperament of our race. The ultimate goal of our religion is emancipation from the bondage of material Nature and freedom from individual rebirth, and certain souls, among the highest we have known, have been drawn by the attraction of the final hush and purity to dissociate themselves from life and bodily action in order more swiftly and easily to reach the goal. Standing like mountain-peaks above the common level, they have attracted all eyes and fixed this withdrawal as the highest and most commanding Hindu ideal. It is for this reason that Sri Krishna laid so much stress on the perfect Yogin's cleaving to life and human activity even after his need of them were over, lest the people, following, as they always do the example of their best, turn away from their dharma and bastard confusion reign. The ideal Yogin is no withdrawn and ren-up force, but ever engaged in doing good to all creatures, either by the flood of the divine energy that he pours on the world or by himself standing in the front of humanity, its leader in the march and the battle but unbound by his works and superior to his personality.

Moreover the word Vedanta is usually identified with the strict Monism and the peculiar theory of Maya established by the lofty and ascetic intellect of Shankara. But it is the Upanishads themselves and not Shankara's writings, the text and not the commentary, that are the authoritative Scripture of the Vedantism. Shankara's, great and temporary satisfying as it was, is still only one synthesis and interpretation of the Upanishads. There have been others in the past which have powerfully influenced the rational mind and there is no reason why there should not be a yet more perfect synthesis in the future. It is such a synthesis, embracing life and action in its scope, that the teachings of Sri Lakshmana and Arjuna have been preparing. What is coming now is a repetition of the earlier stage of what happened in the past, more rapid and more complete, when the world was in the midst of its spiritual and ethics to the Aryan nations. Then as now a mighty spirit, it matters not whether Avatar or Vibhuti, the full expression of God in man or a great outpouring of the divine energy, came down among men and brought into their daily life and practice the force and impulse of utter spirituality. And this time it is the full light and not a noble part, unlike Buddhism which expressing Vedantic morality, yet ignored a fundamental reality of Vedanta and was therefore expelled from its prime seat and cradle. The material result was then what it will be now, a great political, moral and social revolution which made India the Guru of the nations and carried the light she had to give all over the civilized world, moulding ideas and creating forms which are still extant and a living force. Already the Vedanta and the Yoga have exceeded their Asiatic limit and are beginning to influence the life and practice of America and Europe, and they have long been filtering into Western thought by a hundred indirect channels. But these are small rivers and underground streams. The world waits for the rising of India to receive the divine flood in its fulness.

Yoga is communion with God for knowledge, for love or for work. The Yogin puts himself into direct relation with that which is omniscient and omnipotent within man and without him; He is in tune with the infinite, he becomes a channel for the strength of God to pour itself out upon the world whether through calm benevolence or active benevolence. When a man rises by putting from him the slough of self and lives for others and in the joys and sorrows of others;—when he works perfectly and with love and zeal, but casts away the anxiety for results and is neither eager for victory nor afraid of defeat;—when he devotes all his works to God and lays every thought, word and deed as an offering on the divine altar;—when he gets rid of fear and hatred, repulsion and disgust and attachment, and works like the forces of Nature, unhesitating, unceasing, inevitably, perfectly;—when he rises above the thought that he is the body or the heart or the mind or the sum of these and finds his own and true self; when he becomes aware of his immortality and the unreality of death; when he experiences the advent of knowledge and feels himself passive and the divine force working unresisted through his mind, his speech his senses and all his organs;—when having thus abandoned whatever he is does or his to the Lord of all, the Lover and Helper of mankind, he dwells permanently in Him and becomes incapable of grief, disquiet or false excitement,—that is Yoga. Pranayam and asans, concentration, worship, ceremonies, religious practice are not themselves Yoga but only a means towards Yoga. Nor is Yoga a difficult or dangerous path, it is safe and easy to all who take refuge with the Inner Guide and Teacher. All men are potentially capable of it, for there is no man who has not strength or faith or love developed or latent in his nature, and any one of these is a sufficient staff for the Yogin. All cannot, indeed, reach in a single life the highest in this path, but all can go forward; and in proportion as a man advances he gets peace, strength and joy. And even a little of this dharma delivers man or nation out of great fear.

It is an error, we repeat, to think that spirituality is a thing divorced from life. “Abandon all” says the Isha Upanishad “that thou mayst enjoy all, neither covet any man’s possession. But verily do thy deeds in this world and wish to live thy hundred years; no other way is given thee than this to escape the bondage of thy acts”. It is an error to think that the heights of religion are above the struggles of this world. The recurrent cry of Sri Krishna to Arjuna is on the struggle; “Fight and overthrow thy opponents!” “Remember me and fight!” “Give up all thy works to me with a heart full of spirituality, and free from craving, free from selfish claims, fight! let the fever of thy soul pass from thee”. It is an error to imagine that even when the religious man does not give up his ordinary activities, he yet becomes too sattvic, too saintly, too loving or too passionless for the rough work of the world. Nothing can be more extreme and uncompromising than the reply of the Gita in the opposite sense, “whoever has his temperament purged from egoism, whoever suffers not his soul to receive the impress of the deed, though he slay the whole world yet he stays not and is not bound.” The Charioteer of Kurukshetra driving the chariot of Arjuna over that field of ruin is the image and description of Karma-yoga, for the body is the chariot and the senses are the horses of the driving and it is through the blindfolded and misdirected ways of the world that Krishna points the soul of man to the goal.

“SWARAJ” AND THE MUSULMANS.

We extract in our columns this week the comments of Srijut Bepin chandra Pal’s organ, Swaraj, on the Government’s Pro-Mahomedan policy and its possible effects in the future. We are glad to see this great Nationalist again expressing his views with his usual originality and fine political insight. We do not ourselves understand the utility of such a campaign as Srijut Bepin Chandra is carrying on in England. In politics quite as much as in ordinary conduct the rule of desh-kal-patra, the right place, the right time and the right person, conditions the value and the effectiveness of the work. For Bepin Babu’s mission there could not be a worse place than England, a worse time than the present and a worse audience than the British people. What is the prophet of self help and dissociation doing in England? Or what kind of message is this that he carries to the British public, “We do not welcome your favours, we reject your help and sympathy and will have no political association with you until Swaraj is ours,—and therefore I am here speaking to you and publishing my views to a British audience in London?” We can only suppose that Bepin Babu does really imagine he can produce some kind of effect worth having, moral if not substantial, upon the ruling nation, and if so what does it portend? Is Saul also among the prophets? Does Bepin too stand in the doorway of Britania?

The first three or four issues of Swaraj disappointed our expectations. A sense of the unreality of his position seemed to haunt the writer and robbed his writing of the former strength and close touch with the subject. It was the old views, the familiar thought, the well-known manner, but it neither convinced, illuminated nor inspired. This month’s Swaraj is more confident and effective, although the thing still seems to be in the air. The passage extracted and the admirable character-sketch of Srijut Shyamaunder Chakrabarti are the best things in the issue. Bepin Babu seems to have recovered the copious vein of thought, the subtle and flexible reasoning, the just and original view of his subject which made one wait with impatience for every fresh number of New India. His attitude towards the reform scheme and the Mahomedan demand for a separate electorate is the attitude which has consistently been adopted by the Nationalist party in Bengal towards the Hindu-Mahomedan question in ordinary politics. We do not fear Mahomedan opposition; so long as it is the honest Swadeshi article and not manufactured in Shillong or Simla, we welcome it as a sign of life and aspiration. We do not shun, we desire the awakening of Islam in India even if its first crude efforts are misdirected against ourselves; for all strength, all energy, all action is girt to the mill of the nation-builder. In that faith we are ready, when the time comes for us to meet in the political field to exchange with the Musulman, just as he chooses, the firm clasp of the brother or the resolute grip of the wrestler.

That time has not yet come. There is absolutely no reason why the electoral question should create bad blood between the two communities, for if we leave aside the limited number who still hunger after loaves and fishes or nurse dead delusions, the reforms have no living interest for the Hindu. His field of energy lies elsewhere than in the enlarged pretences of British Liberalism. His business is to find out his own strength and prepare it for a great future, and the less he meddles with unreal politics and nerveless activities, the better for the nation. The Mahomedan has not progressed so far. He has to taste the sweets of political privilege and find them turn to ashes in his mouth. He has to formulate demands, rejoice at promises, fume at betrayals, until he thoroughly discovers the falsity and impossibility of his hopes. His progress is likely to be much swifter than ours has been in the past, for he gets the advantage if not of our experience, at least of the ideas now in the air and of the more bracing and stimulating atmosphere. He is more likely to demand than to crave, and his disillusionment must necessarily be the speedier. It is then that and he too will seek the strength in himself and touch the true springs of self development. Our best policy is to leave the Mahomedan representatives on the councils to work out their destiny face to face with the bureaucracy, with no weightier Hindu counterpoise than the better politicians, the timeservers and the self-seekers.

Of one thing we may be certain, that Hindu-Mahomedan unity can not be effected by political adjustments or Congress flatteries. It must be sought deeper down, in the heart and the mind, for where the causes of disunion are, there the remedies must be sought. We shall do well in trying to solve the problem to remember that misunderstanding is the most fruitful cause of our differences, that love compels love and that strength conciliates the strong. We must strive to remove the causes of misunderstanding by a better mutual knowledge and sympathy; we must extend the unfaltering love of the patriot to our Muslim brother, remembering always that in him too Narayana dwells and to him too our Mother has given a permanent place in her bosom; but we must cease to approach him falsely or flatter out of a selfish weakness and cowardice. We believe this to be the only practical way of dealing with the difficulty. As a political question the Hindu-Mahomedan problem does not interest us at all, as a national problem it is of supreme importance. We shall make it a main part of our work to place Mahomed and Islam in a new light before our readers, to spread juster views of Mahomedan history and civilisation, to appreciate the Muslim's place in our national development and the means of harmonising his communal life with our own, not ignoring the difficulties that stand in our way but making the most of the possibilities of brotherhood and mutual understanding. Intellectual sympathy can only draw together, the sympathy of the heart can alone unite. But the one is a good preparation for the other.

THE ISHA UPANISHAD.

1. All that is and moves in the moving universe with the Lord must be covered; abandon all that thou mayest enjoy all, neither covet any man's possession.

2. Verily do thy deeds in this world and wish to leave thy hundred years, there is no other way given thee than this to escape the bondage of thy acts.

3. For godless are these worlds and enveloped in blind gloom where all they after death resort who slay their own selves.

4. There is One that unmoving is swifter than thought, and the gods can not reach It for It glides far in front; standing It outstrips other as they run. In It Udghatayanti ordoreth the waters in their place.

5. It moves and It moveth not. It is near and It is far, It is within the universe and It is outside the universe.

6. But he that seeth all creatures in the self and the self in all creatures, therefore shrinketh from nothing neither hateth any man.

7. He who knows, whose soul has become one with all creatures, how shall he be deluded by passion, whence shall he have grief to whom all things are One?

8. This is the Brightness that went out to every side, and it hath no body nor sinews nor imperfection, It is pure and unwounded by sin. He is the seer and the thinker, He is supreme and self-born; this is He that from years sempiternal hath ordered perfectly all things.

9. Into a blind darkness they enter who serve the Illusion, but a blinder gloom is theirs who cling to the Knowledge alone.

10. For one thing cometh by the Illusion and another cometh by the Knowledge, so have we heard from the calm of soul who unfolded That to our knowing.

11. But he who knoweth the Illusion and the Knowledge in one, by the Illusion ferrieth safe over death and and tasteth immortality by the Knowledge.

12. Into a blind darkness they enter who serve the Unbirth, but a blinder gloom is theirs who cling to the Birth alone.

13. For one thing cometh of the Birth and another cometh of the Unbirth, so have we heard from the calm of soul who unfolded That to our knowing.

14. But he who knoweth the Birth and the Unbirth in one, by the Unbirth ferrieth safe over death and by the Birth tasteth immortality.

15. O fostering Sun who hast hidden the face of truth with thy golden shield, from his vision who liveth the truth displace that splendid veil. O Sun.

16. O Fosterer, O Solitary Traveller, O Lord and Death, O Sun, O Child of God, dissipate thy beams, gather inward thy light, so shall I behold that thy goodliest form of all. For the Being who is there and there, He am I.

17. The breath it is wind, the soul immortal abides; of my body ashes only are left. Om! O Will remember thy deeds, remember. Remember thy deeds, O Will, remember.

18. Exalt me, O Fire, to that felicity by the path of the good, O Lord that knowest all, O witness of all deeds, war down the devious sin of man's soul, O Fire. Profoundest speech of adoration to thee we devise.

AUROBINDO GHOSH,

PRO-MAHAMEDAN POLICY. THE LARGER EVIL OR THE GREATER GOOD?

But the larger evil of these "reforms" will be the creation of a new cause of conflict between the Hindus and the Mahomedans. We are not a judge of the motives of people. We do not know what Lord Morley's motives are. Personally, he would perhaps have liked to have one register for all voters for the Council-elections in any locality. The acceptance of a separate register for the Mahomedans has, perhaps, been forced upon him by his own Anglo-Indian advisers, or by considerations of his political opponents. But whatever the motive, the result of his "reforms" will be to divide the whole of India, practically, into two rival camps, one Hindu, the other Mahomedan. It will create the conceit of separate and rival political interests between these two communities, where, in reality, there are no such divergencies. This, some people may think, will help to keep the Hindus and the Mahomedans apart from one another, and, thereby, prevent the political fusion of the two peoples into a common and composite national unit. In the Legislative Councils, this arrangement will make it easy for the intriguing officials, if they are so inclined, to play the one class off against the other, and thus retain their own power and control over these bodies. All this may be true. But we are not afraid of these evils. We believe that even these will turn to our own good. They are all friends in disguise.

GREATER EVILS THAN DENOMINATIONAL RIVALRIES.

For, let us not forget there are much greater evils than denominational rivalries or religious conflicts in political life. The Indian Nationalist, striving for the political emancipation and advancement of his country, is not afraid of conflicts. In his eye, the greatest evil is the stolid stupor of his people. It is the lack of living interest of the general masses of the people in political and national affairs, that constitutes the root-evil in our present public life. We are not at all anxious, like the puppet politicians of the mendicant school, to present what is called a united front to the British Government or the British public. Ours is not a game of bluff or bluster. We do not want to show ourselves as a nation: we desire to be one. And nations grow through conflicts, first among themselves, and then with outside forces or rivals. A good deal of beating is needed to solidify masses of incoherent matter into one strong block, as well as to solidate incoherent human units or groups of units,—and thus form them into a strong and consolidated nation. The weakness of our political life has lain really in the lack of political rivalries, and the consequent dead monotony of our political work and agitation. The new political life in the country has developed with the birth of the new school of Indian politics that has divided Indian political workers into two opposing camps, with separate ideas, cries, and programmes. To condemn all internal divisions or conflicts as suicidal to the National cause, is mere copy-book politics. Union is strength only when the units uniting together are themselves strong. And conflicts contribute to the strength of the units in the earlier stages of social growth and consolidation.

internal conflicts are suicidal at a later stage, when there is a physical trial between a people desiring a change in their political constitution, and those who hold political authority over them. Such conflicts would be fatal in Turkey now. But in the earlier and formative stages of a nation's life, these conflicts are positively helpful to its growth and vigour. In this stage, there are much greater evils than religious divisions and denominational rivalries.

THE VALUE OF CONFLICTS IN PUBLIC LIFE.

We welcome these conflicts. That the Government in India is helping to create them shows the contemptible statesmanship that rules their counsel. The Mahomedans have, as a class, so long kept themselves away from the general political work of the country. It is partly the result of their neglect of the modern systems of education introduced into the country by the British. It is largely due to the general inertia and listlessness characteristic of that community. The Mahomedan masses are too burdened with their daily toil to have time or energy left for participation in general public agitations. In this respect, the Hindu masses also stood, until recently, on the same plane. But the public life and activities of the Hindu classes had an indirect effect on the Hindu masses, the absence of which, in the upper classes of the Mahomedans, deprived the Mahomedan masses of that political quickening which their Hindu neighbours have received. In this general inertia of the Indian people, and especially of the Indian Mahomedans, lay, up to now, the main strength of the bureaucracy, as it constituted a source of fatal weakness to the Nationalist cause. In view of the general aloofness of the upper classes of our Mahomedan fellow-countrymen from all our political activities we found it difficult, if not impossible, so long to quicken any political or public interest in the Mahomedan masses. The Mahomedan leaders have hitherto been almost completely at the bidding of the bureaucracy. The Mahomedan masses have been more or less completely at the bidding of their leaders. The Government have, therefore, found it easy, whenever they wanted, to turn these against popular political movements. In the Anti-Partition Agitation in Bengal, though the Mahomedan leaders at first joined it, Lord Curzon soon weaned them away from us, and the Nabab of Dacca was able to set up a Mahomedan agitation in favour of the Partition. It has been so in connection with other matters, in the other provinces also. Had our Mahomedan fellow-countrymen a political life and programme of their own, even if it stood in opposition to that of the Hindus, they would not have been such easy and willing tools in the hands of the bureaucracy. The primary thing is that they must have some public, some political life. Lord Morley's "reforms" promise to quicken this life in them. That is no small gain. Political conflicts and rivalries are sure signs of political life. They indicate the creation of new interests among the people, larger than the narrow and selfish interests of the individual and the family. They show the birth of public life, and are, at the same time, themselves the means of that birth. The keener these conflicts, the more vigorous becomes the public life of the combatants. All strength comes through struggle and conflict. Physical contests (and conflicts strengthen the fibres of the flesh, political contests strengthen the roots of political life. They tend, also, in the long run, to consolidate political life as well. Such a consolidation is absolutely necessary for the building up of a vigorous and self-contained and self-supported composite nation in India. This is the supreme value of even internal conflicts in our present political life. Such conflicts would be fatal to the National cause, if there was, or going soon to be, any physical contest between the forces of popular freedom and autocratic authority in the country. In the present stage of our political and national life, when public opinion has to be formed, political education has to be imparted, and a healthy and vigorous public life to be developed among the people, internal conflicts are about the only methods of realising these ends. What the Indian Nationalist has to fight now is the stolid stupor and mortal inertia of the masses, and whatever is calculated to remove this must be welcome to him. Lord Morley has, perhaps unconsciously, rendered an invaluable service to the Nationalist cause, by initiating, with the help of his "reforms," a real political conflict between the Hindus and the Mahomedans in India.

THE HINDU MAHOMEDAN POLICY.

In any case, the Indian Nationalist would have to squarely face, and finally solve, the Hindu-Mahomedan problem some day. The Hindu will have to be taught to recognise the claims of the Mahomedan to an equal position with himself in the common life of the State in India. The Mahomedan will have to be cured of the conceit of separate interests and superior strength, and recognise his own legitimate place and interests in the life of the composite Indian nation. The sense of conflicting interests between the two communities will have to be cured before India can grow into a strong, and unite, and harmonious though not homogeneous nationhood. This Hindu-Mohomedan problem has to be boldly faced. Its solution may be deferred temporarily but cannot be evaded permanently. And it is best that it should be solved now, when the strong arm of the British is in the land, precluding all possibilities of any physical conflict between the two communities. And it is doubtful whether we could have advanced the solution of this problem in any better way than what Providence seems clearly to be following through these Morleyan reforms.

CONFOUNDED IN THEIR WISDOM.

And the wise will soon stand confounded in their wisdom. The weapons they have hitherto been using against us have already commenced to be turned against their own policy. They have always twitted the Hindu with his political insignificance. He is physically a weakling. Politically, he is a cypher, or at least was, until the British took him up by the hand and gave him a position which he never had for countless generations. The real political force in India was the Mahomedan. He was the ruler of the country before the British, and but for the presence of the British, he would still hold the Hindu down to his proper position of servitude. All this has been said and urged against the Hindu politician by Anglo-Indian opponents. All this was not true, we know. The Mahomedans are not, physically, superior to the Hindu. The British did not succeed the Moghul, but really the Sikhs and the Marhattas, who had wrestled the political power in India from the enfeebled hands of the descendants of Aurangzeb. But the falsehood served its purpose. It was good enough to be thrown at the irrepressible Hindu agitator. But the Nansen has come. The Mahomedans have risen up to demand their place as a political force greater than what their numerical strength would signify—in the administrative scheme of the country. They have been told that they are a superior race. They cannot be blamed for believing in this pleasant statement. And now they naturally claim superior treatment and larger powers, greater advantages that their numbers would justify. They demand, not quantitative, but qualitative treatment—special privileges to which they are entitled by their superior political significance. And it had to be conceded. And the concession has created a new self-consciousness in the Mahomedan leaders. They are shrewd enough to recognise the weakness of the official position. They see clearly that the Government is anxious to use them against the Hindus. They are willing to be so used, but on their own terms. They are not satisfied with what Lord Morley has already given them. They want more—a separate register from top to bottom, from the Legislative Council electorates down to those of the Local and District Boards and Municipalities. The Government proposed to meet their requirements partly by special Mahomedan electorates and partly by nomination. They would have none of the latter. No nomination, is their cry. They want election upon their own special register, all through. Are the Government prepared to concede to this demand? If so, the new Councils, on the non-official side will be almost entirely elective. The only nominated members will be the officials. If there be few or no nomination of non-officials to these Councils, the chances of combination of the non-officials against the officials will be considerably increased. Are the Government prepared to take the consequences of such coalition? If they are not, then the Mahomedan demand will have to be rejected. In either case, there will be a distinct gain to the Nationalist cause.

Frankly speaking, we like the present Mahomedan attitude. Every thorough Nationalist had been longing for a little self-assertion in his Mahomedan compatriot. Lord Morley's reforms have brought it about. The Mahomedan leaders no longer plead for pity on account of their backward position, but have commenced to manfully demand their rights. Even the Nabab of Dacca realises his own power and importance, and refuses any longer to be patronised by the bureaucracy. By wresting the concession of denominational electorates, and representation in excess of their numerical ratio, from Lord Morley, Mr. Ameer Ali and his friends have indirectly rendered a signal service to the Nationalist cause in India, the full significance of which time alone will reveal. Not Lord Morley's reforms, but these concessions and the new political consciousness and attitude, constitute really a new chapter in Indian politics and modern Indian history. There may be a little friction between the Hindu and the Mahomedan in regard to these concessions. There may be a new conflict between the two communities, but these will not last. The Mahomedan will soon realise that his political advancement, lies, not in holding aloof from the Hindu, but in making common cause with him. The present conceit of separate political interests will soon be cured by the actual experiences of political work, even in the new Councils. The new attitude of the Mahomedan leaders show that they will no longer allow themselves to be used as a cat's-paw by the British officials in India, but will take up an independent attitude. The bureaucracy will fall in the pit which they thought they had cleverly dug for the Hindus. "Swaraaj"

UTTARPARASPEECH

(Of Script Anandindo Ghosh)

When I was asked to speak to you at the annual meeting of your Sabha, it was my intention to say a few words about the subject chosen for today, —the subject of the Hindu religion. I do not know now whether I shall fulfil that intention; for as I sat here, there came into my mind a word that I have to speak to you, —a word that I have to speak to the whole of the Indian Nation. It was spoken first to myself in jail and I have come out of jail to speak it to my people.

It was more than a year ago that I came here last. When I came I was not alone; one of the mightiest prophets of Nationalism sat by my side. It was he who then came out of the seclusion to which God had sent him so that in the silence and solitude of his cell he might hear the word that he had to say. It was he that you came to your hundreds to welcome. Now he is far away, separated from us by thousands of miles. Others whom I was accustomed to find working beside me are absent. The storm that swept over the country has scattered them far and wide. It is I this time who have spent one year in seclusion, and now that I come out I find all changed. One who always sat by my side and was associated in my work as a prisoner in Burma; another is in the north rotting in detention. I looked round when I came out, I looked round for those to whom I had been accustomed to look for counsel and inspiration. I did not find them. There was more than that. When I went to jail, the whole country was alive with the cry of Bande Mataram, alive with the hope of a nation, the hope of millions of men who had newly risen out of degradation. When I came out of jail I listened for that cry, but there was instead a silence. A hush had fallen on the country and men seemed bewildered; for instead of God's bright heaven full of the vision of the future that had been before us, there seemed to be overhead a leaden sky from which human thunders and lightnings rained. No man seemed to know which way to move, and from all sides came the question, "What shall we do next? What is there that we can do?" I too did not know which way to move, I too did not know what was next to be done. But one thing I knew, that as it was the Almighty power of God which had raised that cry, that hope, that silence, —He who was in the meeting and the movement was also in the pause and the hush. He has sent it upon us so that the nation might draw back for a moment and look into itself and know His will. I have not been disheartened by that silence because I had been made familiar with silence in my prison and because I knew it was in the pause and the hush that I had myself learned this lesson through the long year of my detention. When Bepin Chandra Pal came out of jail, he came with a message, and it was an inspired message. I remember the speech he made here. It was a speech not so much political as religious in its bearing and intention. He spoke of his realization in jail, of God within us all, of Lord within the nation, and in his subsequent speeches also he spoke of a greater than ordinary force in the movement and a greater than ordinary purpose before it. Now I also meet you again, I also come out of jail, and again it is you of Uttarpara who are the first to welcome me, not at a political meeting but at a meeting of a society for the protection of our religion. That message which Bepin Chandra Pal received in Buxar jail, God gave to me in Alipore. That knowledge he gave to me day after day during my twelve months of imprisonment and it is that which He has commanded me to speak to you now that I have come out.

I knew I would come out. The year of detention was meant only for a year of seclusion and of training. How could anyone hold me in jail longer than was necessary for God's purpose? He had given me a word to speak and a work to do, and until that word was spoken I knew that no human power could hush me, until that work was done no human power could stop God's instrument, however weak that instrument might be or however small. Now that I have come out, even in these few minutes, a word has been suggested to me which I had no wish to speak. The thing I had in my mind he has thrown from it and what I speak is under an impulse and a compulsion.

When I was arrested, and hurried to the Lalbazar hajat, I was shaken in faith for a while, for I could not look into the heart of his intention. Therefore I faltered for a moment and cried out in my heart to him, "what is this that has happened to me? I believed that I had a mission to work for the people of my country and until that work was done, I should have thy protection. Why then am I here and on such a charge?" A day passed and a second day and a third, and when a voice came to me from within, "wait and see." Then I grew calm and waited. I was taken from Lalbazar to Alipore and was placed for one month in a solitary cell apart from men. There I waited day and night for the voice of God within me, to know what he had to say to me, to learn what I had to do. In this seclusion the earliest realisation, the first lesson came to me. I remembered then that a month or more before my arrest a call had come to me to put aside all activity to go into seclusion and to look into myself so that I might enter into closer communion with Him. I was weak and could not accept the call. My work was very dear to me and in the pride of my heart I thought, that unless I was there, it would suffer or even fail and cease; therefore I would not leave it. It seemed to me that He spoke to me again and said, "The bonds you had not strength to break, I have broken for you, because it is not my will nor was it ever my intention that that should continue. I have have another thing for you to do and if is for that I have brought you here to teach you what you could not learn for yourself —I will train you for my work." Then He put the Gita in my hands. His strength entered into me and I was able to do the salhar of the Gita. I was not only to understand intellectually but to realise what Srikrishna demanded of Arjuna and what He demands of those who aspire to do his work, to be free from repulsion and desire, to do work for Him without the demand for fruit, to renounce self-will and become a passive and faithful instrument in His hands, to have an equal heart for high and low, friend and opponent, success and failure, yet not do His work negligently. I realised what the Hindu religion meant. We speak often of the Hindu religion, of the Sanatan Dharma, but few of us really know what that religion is. Other religions are preponderatingly religions of faith and profession, but the Sanatana Dharma is life itself; it is a thing that has not so much to be believed as lived. This is the dharma that for the salvation of humanity was cherished in the seclusion of this peninsula from of old. It is to give this religion that India is rising. She does not rise as other countries do, for self or when she is strong, to trample on the weak. She is rising to shed the eternal light entrusted to her over the world. India has always existed for humanity and not for herself and it is for humanity and not for herself that she must be great.

Therefore this was the next thing. He pointed out to me, —He made me realise the central truth of the Hindu religion. He turned the hearts of my jailors to me and they spoke to the Englishman in charge of the jail; "He is suffering in his confinement; let him at least walk outside his cell for half an hour in the morning and in the evening." So it was arranged, and it was while I was walking that His strength again entered into me. I looked at the jail that secluded me from men and it was no longer by its high walls that I was imprisoned; no it was Vasudeva who surrounded me. I walked under the branches of the tree in front of my cell, but it was not the tree, I knew it was Vasudeva, it was Srikrishna whom I saw standing there and holding over me His shade. I looked at the bars of my cell, the very grating that did duty for a door and again I saw Vasudeva. It was Narayana who was guarding and standing sentry over me. Or I lay on the coarse blankets that were given me for a couch and felt the arm of Srikrishna around me; the arms of my friends and lover. This was the first use of the deeper vision he gave me. I looked at the prisoners in the jail, the thieves, the murders, the swindlers, and as I looked at them I saw Vasudeva, it was Narayana whom I found in these darkened souls and misshapen bodies. Amongst these thieves and desperadoes there were many who put me to a shame by their sympathy, their kindness, the humanity triumphant over such adverse circumstances. (One I saw among them especially who seemed to me a saint, a servant of my nation who did not know how to read and write, an alleged seditious sentenced to ten years rigorous imprisonment, one of those whom we look down upon in our Pharisaical pride of class as chandals.) I saw more. He spoke to me and said, "Behold, the people among whom I have sent you, you do a little of my work. This is the nature of the nation I am raising up and the manner by I raise them."

When the case opened in the lower court and I was asked by the Magistrate, I was asked by the same Magistrate. He said to me

“When you were in jail, did not your friends fail and did you not cry out to me for help?” Look now at the Magistrate, look now at the prosecuting counsel.

I looked and it was not the Magistrate as I saw, it was Vasudeva, it was Narayana who was sitting there on the bench. I looked at the prosecuting counsel and it was not the counsel for the prosecution that I saw; it was a friend who was sitting there, it was my friend who sat there and smiled. “Now you fear?” He said I am in all men and I rule their actions and their words. My action is still with you and you shall not

This case which is brought against you is not for you. It was for the trial that I brought you here but something else. The case itself is only a trial for my work and nothing more.” After the trial opened in the Sessions Court, I began to write many instructions for the Counsel as to what was “false” in the evidence against me and on what points the witnesses might be cross-examined. Then something happened which I had not expected. The arrangements which had been made for my defence were suddenly changed and another Counsel stood there to defend me. He came unexpectedly, — a friend of mine, but I did not know was coming. You have all heard the name of a man who put away from him all other thoughts and abandoned all his practice, who kept up half the night day after day for months and broke his health to save me, — Srijut Bittarunjan Das. When I saw him, I was satisfied, but I still thought it necessary to write instructions. Then that was put from me and I had the message from within. “This is the man who will save you from the snares put around your feet. Put aside those papers. It is not you who will instruct him, I will instruct him.” From that time I did not of myself speak a word to my Counsel about the case or give a single instruction and even when I was asked a question, I always and that my answer did not help the case. I had left it to him and he took it entirely into his hands, with what result you know. I knew all along what he meant for me, for I heard it again and again, always I listened to the voice [within; “I am guiding, therefore fear not. Turn to your own work for which I have brought you to jail and when you come out, remember never to fear, never to hesitate. Remember that it is I who am doing this, not you nor any other. Therefore whatever clouds may come, whatever dangers and sufferings, whatever difficulties, whatever impossibilities, there is nothing impossible, nothing difficult. I am in the nation and its uprising and I am Vasudeva, I am Narayana, and what I will, shall be, not what others will. What I choose to bring about, no human power can stay.”

A SWADESHI MEETING.

(BEADON SQUARE)

SREJUT AUROBINDO GHOSHE'S SPEECH.

In spite of the foul weather a large number of people assembled on Sunday afternoon at Beadon Square where a big Swadeshi meeting was held under the presidency of Babu Ramnanda Chatterjee, Editor of the Prabashi. Several speakers addressed the meeting. We publish below an authorised version of Mr. Aurobindo Ghose's speech delivered at that meeting.

Sr. Aurobindo Ghose said that when in jail he had been told that the country was demoralized by the repressions. He could not believe it then because his experience of the movement had been very different. He had always found that when Swadeshi was flagging or the Boycott beginning to relax, it only needed an act of repression on the part of the authorities to give it redoubled vigour. It seemed to him then impossible that the deportations would have a different effect. When nine of the most active and devoted workers for the country had been suddenly hurried away from their homes without any fault on their part without the Government being able to formulate a single definite charge against them, surely the Boycott instead of decreasing would grow tenfold more intense. And what after all were the repressions? Some people sent to prison, some deported, a number of house-searches, a few repressive enactments, limiting the liberty of the press and the platform. This was nothing compared with the price other nations had paid for their liberty. They also would have to suffer much more than this before they could make any appreciable advance towards their goal. This was God's law; it was not the rulers who demanded the price, it was God who demanded it. It was His law that a fallen nation should not be allowed to rise without infinite suffering and mighty effort. That was the price it had to pay for its previous lapses from national duty. The speaker did not think that there was any real demoralisation. There might be a hesitation among the richer and more vulnerable parts of the community to hold conferences or meetings or give public expression to their views and feelings. He did not measure the strength of the movement by the number of meetings or of people present at the meetings. He measured it by the strength and indomitable obstinacy of feeling and purpose in the hearts of the people. Their first duty was to keep firm hold on their ideal and perform steadfastly the vows they had made before God and the nation. The rulers were never tired of saying that we should get self-government when we were fit. Fitness meant national capacity and strength was the basis of capacity. That was what Lord Morley really meant when he asked himself repeatedly whether this was a real uprising of the nation or a passing excitement. He meant, was it a movement with real strength in it, a movement with elemental forces enough in it to resist and survive! That experiment was now being made. They must not expect substantial gains at so small a cost. He had heard vaguely of the reforms when in prison; he had heard them ecstatically described. He was surprised to hear that description. He had been in England for fourteen years and knew something of the English people and their politics. He could not believe that England or any European people would give substantial reforms after so short an agitation and so scanty a proof of national strength. It was not the fault of the British people, it was a law of politics that they, who have, should be unwilling to yield what they have until they had fully tested the determination of the subject people and even then they would only give just as much as they could not help giving. When he came out, he found what these reforms were. The so-called introduction of the elective principle was a sham and the power given was nothing. For the rest, it was a measure arranged with a skill which did credit to the diplomacy of British statesmen so that we should lose and they gain. It would diminish the political power of the educated class which was the brain and backbone of the nation, it would sow discord among the various communities. This was not a real reform but reaction. They would have to go much further in suffering and self-sacrifice before they could hope for anything substantial. They must hold firm in their determination and keep the Swadeshi unimpaired and by that he meant the determination to assert their national individuality in every branch of national activity. There was one thing that might be said how could we expand the Swadeshi if all our methods were taken out of our hands? That could easily be done by the Government. The authorities in this country had absolute and irresponsible power. It had practically been admitted by a responsible member of the Liberal Government that the liberty of no subject of the British Crown was safe in this country if the Government of India took it into its head that he was dangerous or inconvenient, if they were informed by the police who had distinguished themselves at Madnapore or by information as tainted—the perjurers, forgers, informers, approvers, for what other information could they have, circumstanced as they were by their own choice in this country,—that such and such men had been seditious or were becoming seditious or might be seditious or that their presence in their homes was dangerous to the peace of mind of the C. I. D. Against such information there was no safety even for the greatest men in the country, the purest in life, the most blameless and inoffensive in their public activity. Then there was this sunset regulation. It appeared that we were peaceful citizens until sunset but after sunset we turned into desperate characters,—well, he was told, even half an hour before sunset; apparently even the sun could not be entirely trusted to keep us straight. We had, it seems, stones in our pockets to throw at the police and some of us, perhaps, dangle bombs in our chaddars. How was this prohibition brought about? Merely by a little expenditure of ink in the Political Department. It would be quite easy to extend it further and prevent public meetings. It was being enforced on us that our so-called liberties were merely Maya. We believed in them for a time and acted on the belief; then one fine morning we wake up and look around for them and they are not there. In reality they never were there; they were Maya. That is the reason why we in Bengal instead of accepting no reforms which did not mean control, some of us did not believe even in that but that was the minimum on which all were agreed. Still if all our liberties were taken away, what were we to do? Even that would not stop the movement. Christ said to the disciples who expected a material kingdom on the spot. "The kingdom of heaven is within you." To them too he might say "The kingdom of Swaraj is within you." Let them win and keep that kingdom of Swaraj, the sense of the national separateness and individuality, the faith in its greatness and future, the feeling of God within ourselves and in the nation, the determination to devote every thought and action to His service. Here no coercion or repression could interfere; here there was no press law or sunset regulation. And it was a law of the psychology of men and nations that the Brahma once awakened within must manifest itself without and nothing could eventually prevent that manifestation. Moreover, their methods were borrowed from England. England gave them and encouraged their use when it was inoffensive to her, but the moment they were used so as to conflict with British interests and to expand national life and strength, they were taken away. But the Indians were a nation apart; they were not dependent on those methods. They had a wonderful power of managing things without definite means. Long before the Press came into existence or telegraph wires, the nation had a means of spreading news from one end of the country to another with electrical rapidity—a Press too impalpable to be touched. They had the power of enforcing the public will without any fixed organization, of associating without an association—without even the European refuge, of a secret association. The spirit was what mattered, if the spirit were there, the movement would find out its own channels; for after all it was the power of God manifested in the movement which would command its own means and create its own means and create its own channels. They must have the firm faith that India must rise and be great and that everything that happened, every difficulty, every reverse must help and further their end. The trend was upward and the time of decline was over. The morning was at hand and once the light had shown itself, it could never be night again. The dawn would soon be complete and the sun rise over the horizon. The sun of India's destiny would rise and fill all India with its light and overflow India and overflow Asia and overflow the world. Every hour, every moment could only bring them nearer to the brightness of the day that God had decreed.—THE BENGAL.

NEWS.

SRIJUT SUBODH CHANDRA—Srijut Subodh Chandra Mallik has been quietly removed to Dacca. The removal is sudden and unexpected, its reasons are not known.

BURDWAN COUNCILS.—Mr. Buchanan, in reply to Mr. Keir Hardie, said that Lord Morley was unable to state the date when the Councils Act would take effect in Bengal. The Government of India was considering the matter and would publish the Regulations as soon as possible.

DEPORTEES.—Replying to Mr. Mackarness, Mr. Buchanan said that the latter's Bill, introduced on the 9th instant regarding the cases of deportation, would be sent to the Government of India in the ordinary course. Lord Morley has not prepared to take any action prior to a matured decision of Parliament.

The Lieutenant-Governor has decided to entrust the inquiry to Mr. D.J. Macpherson, C. I. E., Commissioner of the Burdwan Division, who assumed charge in the middle of November when proceedings before the committing Magistrate were already far advanced. The following notes regarding the subjects to which his attention could be directed are recorded for his guidance.

FROM SIMLA COMES THE FOLLOWING NEWS :—We understand that the Government of India has heard nothing from home of the cases of the Bengal deportees coming up for consideration shortly, as implied in Lord Morley's speech at Oxford on Saturday last. It is the fact that all these cases come up for consideration periodically, and very probably Lord Morley was thinking of this. At any rate, we gather that there is no justification for assuming that any of the deportees will be released pending further detailed consideration referred to by Lord Morley.

THE BOMB AGAIN.—A few days ago certain information reached the Police Station at Culpis in Diamond Harbour to the effect that a bomb factory was secretly working at Gopalnagore, a village where many wealthy and influential men reside. On receipt of this information Babu Lall Chand Chuckerbutty the Sub Inspector of Police with a posse of constables surrounded the garden house in the early hours of the morning on the 4th instant and began searching every nook and corner. After a fruitless labour for some hours they dug out from under the roots of a tree in the north west corner of the garden a wooden keowni box. It was opened in the presence of some search witnesses and was found to contain two bottles of acid, three phials of some liquid substance, a quantity of dust sulphur, a bundle of red powder, two broken thermometers and a pair of pincers. The police made out a list of the articles found, got it signed by the search witnesses took possession of them and sent them to the District Superintendent of Police of 24-Parganas for chemical examination. The persons alleged to be concerned denied all knowledge of the charge. As the garden was accessible from all sides and was in a neglected condition the police left the place without making any arrest.

BARRAH DACOLTY.—As the result of the finding of the High court in the Barrah Dacoly Case, there has been going on at Dacca an enquiry into the conduct of the C. I. D. police. Mr. Bonham Carter, with Messrs. Le Mesurier (the gentleman who said Sir Bampfylde Fuller in his letter of resignation, should not be "involved in his fall") and Baker are examining the responsible C. I. D. officers in the commissioner's bungalow. Nothing has yet transpired of the evidence recorded as the enquiry is private. Bama charan Bhowmick has been appointed head of the C. I. D. in place of Chandra Kanta Das, who conducted the enquiry into the Barrah case. It will be remembered that in their judgment the Judges referred to the "missing records," as also to the discovery that the printed copy of the proceedings differed from the original in that it failed to give Bimalananda's name in full, or to describe him a Sub-Inspector of Police," and remarked :—"We have thought it right, in the circumstances to notice these two matters. No satisfactory explanation has been forthcoming, and whether they be due to error or design they have unquestionably led the prosecution open, and fairly open, to the criticism to which they have been subjected. If there was design, then no condemnation can be too severe : if the explanation be error then it should be understood that when accused persons are on trial for their lives, such error cannot be excused." And these remarks were passed in spite of the High Court's letter No. 21, dated Calcutta, the 6th January, 1908 in which the then Chief Justice and the Judges agreed with the then Lieutenant Governor of Bengal Sir Andrew Fraser whose eagerness to secure and maintain "the confidence of the public in the administration of the police of the province" is well known—"that it is desirable that the definite points which have occasioned criticism of the action of the police by the Sessions Courts should as far as possible be marshalled for the information of the District Magistrates." The fact that this method of private procedure for "nothing" the conduct of the police agreed upon was disregarded in the present case should be enough to convince the most sceptic of the seriousness of the situation in which Sir Lawrence Jenkins found the affairs of the province :—

THE MISSION OF THE CIVILIANS.—Reuter wired on the 13th instant :—Lord Morley was the guest of the Viceroy-Chancellor, teachers of the Indian Civil Service and probationers at Oxford last night. In proposing the toast of the Service, Lord Morley said that the Indian Minister was rather isolated in the public eye amid the stir of Home affairs. London, this week, had been enormously excited by the Press Conference. He had been rather struck by the extraordinarily small attention given to India almost amounting to nothing. "An Imperial Conference," said his Lordship, "undoubtedly raises delicate questions as to whether common citizenship is to be observed or whether the relations between India and the Colonies should remain as at present." He was not going to expatiate thereon, but, it occurred to him, in reading the proceedings that the part of Hamlet had been omitted because "India, after all the only real Empire you have," "I observed it all," said his Lordship, "with a rather grim feeling that if anything goes wrong with India, the whole material and military conditions of the Empire might be strongly altered." Lord Morley dwelt on the tremendous mission of the Indian Civilian. The good name of England was in their keeping. He was confident, that under the guidance of great officials they would not ignore the Indian, and would not hold aloof from Indian life. Any estrangement between Indians and Europeans would be a tremendous catastrophe. The history of the last six months had been anxious and trying. He was assured that the present position and prospect were reassuring. The Government of India and the Secretary of State had kept the pledge contained in the Sovereign's message of last November. This faith in the mission of the Indian Civilian who come out to India not because they seek "a career philanthropic", but because to them "the slow toil of Europe seems tiring, if certainly worthy of the man whose ignorance of Indian affairs made him declare :—"For as long a time as my poor imagination can pierce through, for so long a time our Government in India must partake, and in no small degree, of the personal and absolute element", and whose reliance on the words of the "man on the spot" has made him believe that the introduction of self-government in India will only result in the English hearing through the dark distances the roar and scream of confusion and carnage in India. "He may think that his anchor holds, but he is certainly not worth arguing with."

TARIFF-REFORM.—Colonel Seely, speaking at Oxford on the 5th June, asserted that disaster would follow the introduction of a tariff, especially in regard to cotton. India would claim protection for her factories, and the whole of England's millions of exports would be excluded. This reminds us of Lord Curzon's shrewd remark that the Indian fiscal policy is dictated not from Calcutta, but from Manchester. "Ever since India was ordered to abolish her custom tariff in 1875 (to be reimposed in 1894), it has been in the main in response to Lancashire's pressure that the successive readjustments of this policy have been introduced" and in the face of Indian public opinion, and sometimes with the utmost reluctance on the part of the Indian Government, they have been passed." The abolition of the cotton duties, as ordered by ex Lord Salisbury in 1876, was accepted with delight by the Viceroy, Lord Lytton and by his Finance Minister, Sir John Strachey. During the ensuing years successive reductions were made in the Indian cotton duties till they were entirely abolished by Lord Ripon in 1882. The financial embarrassment of India compelled a reversal of this policy and a 5 per cent. tariff upon all imports into India was once again introduced. But when the Indian Government proposed to include cotton goods in this tariff they were sharply pulled up by the Secretary of State, Lord Kimberley, who explained his action in the House of Lords by saying that a deputation from Lancashire told him that, without distinction of party there was not a man among them who would not use every possible means at his disposal to agitate and destroy any such measure on the part of Government. Sir Henry Fowler proposed the suspension of import and excise duties on cotton both being fixed at 5 per cent. with a limit of exemption for Indian yarns fixed at 20s. per 24s. Lancashire protested, and the next Secretary of State, Lord George Hamilton ton had to impose both the import and the export duties on all yarns. This policy can be traced back to 1700 when it was enacted that "from and after the 25th day of September 1701, all wrought silks, Bengals, and stuffs mixed with silk or herbs, of the manufacture of China, Persia or the East Indies, and all calicoes, painted, dyed, printed, or stained there, which are or shall be imported into Kingdom (Great Britain) shall not be worn or otherwise used in Great Britain; and all goods imported after that day, shall be warehoused or exported again."

MEMORANDUM OF INSTRUCTIONS.—The following is the Government's memorandum of instructions in the Midnapore inquiry. The High Court have now disposed of the appeal in the Midnapore Conspiracy Case. All the accused have been acquitted and severe strictures have been passed by the Hon'ble Judges on the methods adopted by the police and other officers responsible for the prosecution. The time has accordingly come to set on foot the inquiry into the inception and conduct of the case, which in answer to the allegations made by Mr. Dutt and others during the magisterial proceedings, the Government had expressed its readiness to institute when the judicial proceedings should be concluded.

THE DEPORTATIONS.—In his Lordship's speech Lord Morley said, he was told that there was considerable uneasiness growing in the House of Commons with reference to deportations under a law which was as good a law as any in our Statute Book. A Bill had been introduced which was nothing less than a Vote of Censure on himself and Lord Minto. He did not deny that, if such proceedings were normal it would be detestable and dangerous; but was there to be no such thing as emergency power? Was there not emergency in December, 1908? The Government of India found a grave menace to the very foundations of the public peace and security, and, Lord Morley asked, was Government to be defied with impunity? He himself and the Government of India would then have been unworthy of their position if they had not taken the weapons from the armoury and used it against evil-doers. Owing to the impression that Government could be defied with impunity, it was vital to take severe proceedings in order to give the reformers a fair and reasonable chance. The effect was magical. The time of knives, pistols and the like was not ended, but, at any rate, the Government of India had secured order and tranquillity. The movers of his Vote of Censure, said his Lordship, thought themselves better Indians than the Indians themselves. It was said that they got their evidence from the Police. That was not so. Every case of deportation was fully investigated by Lord Minto, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and the Members of Council. The greatest difference was made in the treatment of deported persons and men judicially charged. Cases would come up for consideration shortly and that consideration would be conducted with great regard to justice, firmness and resolution. There would be no attempt to regard the transaction otherwise than as a disagreeable measure imposed by a sense of public duty which had been justified by events; for Mr. Gokhale has stated that Lord Minto and himself (Lord Morley) had saved India from chaos. Lord Morley added that he thought they would withstand their enemies at the gate with a clear good conscience. The impertinent reference, of course, is to Mr. Mackerness's Bill to modify the Deportation Regulation. In quoting Mr. Gokhale for his authority Lord Morley has miserably misrepresented facts. It is true that Mr. Gokhale said that Lord Morley and Lord Minto had saved India from chaos, but it was not the resort to the Regulation of 1818 that he referred to. In the very speech from which Lord Morley has made the quotation Mr. Gokhale condemned the deportations in unsparring terms. It was in the Council chamber that Mr. Gokhale characterised deportation without trial as a proceeding which stunned the people throughout India. The result of the policy of repression on the Bengalees has thus been referred to by Mr. Gokhale—"The refusal of the sufferers in the recent disturbance to appear before Mr. Weston to give evidence is a significant illustration of the change that is coming over Bengal. The Government propose to meet this change by a policy of repression. My Lord, knowing the people of Bengal as I do, I venture to predict that they will not be thus put down by force."

* * * One serious defect of national character has often been alleged against them,—want of physical courage—but they are already being twitted out of it. The young men of Bengal have taken this reproach so much to heart that, if the stories in some Anglo-Indian papers are to be believed, so far from shrinking from physical collisions, they seem to be now actually spoiling for them. My Lord, if the present estrangement between the Government and the people of Bengal is allowed to continue, ten years hence there will be one man in a hundred in that Province who has a kindly feeling for Englishmen.

HEADS OF INQUIRY.—The suggestion that the Midnapore Conspiracy Case was not genuine did not proceed from "bona fide" information honestly obtained was first definitely made in Mr. Dutt's telegram of the 17th August, 1909, and the letter of the 27th idem, with which he followed it up. The first step should therefore be to examine the evidence which may be forthcoming in support of the allegations made by Mr. Dutt in the documents referred to and any other evidence which Mr. Macpherson may think likely to throw light on the subject.

2. But apart from such allegations, in view of the result of the prosecutions, another branch of the inquiry will be to ascertain whether the information upon which the proceedings were based was worthy of the credit which it received whether the proceedings themselves were properly conducted, and whether as a matter of fact the case was at the bottom a genuine one.

3. It is necessary therefore to consider whether the police and district authorities had grounds for suspecting that there was something going on at Midnapore which required special vigilance, and in the next place whether the measures they took to ascertain what was going on were reasonable and proper.

4. Further, it is necessary to ascertain whether the information which they obtained was properly dealt with, whether the tests and scrutiny, which could be applied, were applied, and whether all important information subsequently stated to have been received by the police was duly and promptly brought to the notice of the superior authorities in the district or of the Criminal Investigation Department as it was received.

5. It should also be ascertained whether the information obtained was so important and apparently so trust-worthy as to demand decisive action, and whether the action actually taken was appropriate.

6. Next it should be determined whether after decisive action had been taken, accused persons arrested and a case instituted, the conduct of the case by the police was right and legal, the treatment of the accused persons while in custody both in jail and out of it was fair and in accordance with law, and the supervision by the District Magistrate and his staff was attentively and anxiously directed to further the ends of justice. For this purpose the officers whose conduct has been impugned should have the fullest opportunity of explaining matters and of directing attention to any evidence which may be available and to any means of eliciting information on material points.

7. Lastly, it is necessary to arrive at general conclusions as to whether there was at the bottom a genuine case requiring action and whether the conduct of officers of all ranks in relation to it was fair and straightforward and such as could be attributed to honest zeal in the performance of their duty.

8. It is believed that these instructions will cover all the points affecting the action of the local officers, to which attention has been directed in the judgement of the High Court. If however that should prove not to be the case, it should be clearly understood that the inquiry is intended to extend to all such matters, and that the report should deal with them with such completeness as may require.

9. It will be clearly understood that the present inquiry is neither exclusively nor even primarily restricted to the individuals or the circumstances lately under consideration by the High Court. The Lieutenant-Governor desires that it should include everything which in the Commissioner's opinion is likely throw light on the existence of a conspiracy directed against the Government and the persons if any concerned therein, whether they have appeared before the Courts or not.

—Subject to these instructions entire discretion is left to Mr. Macpherson as to his procedure and methods in the conduct of the inquiry.

THE KIRWAN MURDER CASE.

Judgment was passed on Thursday the 17th June in the Chief Court of Burmah by the Chief Judge and Mr. Justice Parlett, allowing the appeals and acquitting Moola Jan and three others sentenced to death by the Sessions Judge of Tenasserim on a charge of having murdered Mr. J. Kirwan late European overseer, P. W. D. on the 20th December last. In the course of the judgment covering nearly one hundred pages foolscap, Sir Charles Fox passed severe criticism on the Sessions Judge and the Police. His Honour said, never in all his experience had he come across a case in which evidence against the accused was of such a dubious nature. The more he had studied the evidence and the circumstances of this case the more had he been astonished that any judge could form the conclusion that four accused had been proved without reasonable doubt to have been concerned in murdering Kirwan. His Honour's view of the case was that the accused should never have been sent before the Magistrate on such manifestly dubious evidence as the subordinate police had obtained. If there has been any real investigation into the case and had there been some one to exercise intelligent consideration of the evidence adduced and enquired to decide on the evidence such as could not be acted upon here possibly the real facts attending Kirwan's death might have come out and the accused would not have been deprived of their liberty for over five months with the charge of murder hanging over their heads. His Honour held, the circumstances of blood, etc., in the jungle and bags containing Kirwan's remains lying in the creek were manufactured and suspicions aroused by such manufactured circumstances have been backed up by the appalling mass of perjury.

BOMBAY BOMB.

The G. I. Ry. Police on Tuesday night arrested a Brahmin passenger by the Calcutta mails at Kalyan Junction. The man whose name was Haoci Vaishnu Athvale was travelling without a ticket and the ticket-collector made him alight with his luggage consisting of a steel trunk. A policeman on seeing the trunk grew suspicious, and asked Athvale what was the contents, and he replied the trunk contained clothes. The policeman on lifting the trunk found it heavy and asked Athvale to open it. He said the trunk was given him by a friend at Bombay, to convey to Jalgaon whither he (Athvale) was going. This did not satisfy the policeman who forced open the trunk and found so it is alleged, several phials of chemicals implements and fuses for making bombs. The police are very reticent about the matter. Athvale was brought back under arrest to Bombay.

THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

The Madras Provincial Conference, opened at Bernahampore in the Kallikote Diamond Jubilee Town Hall. The President-elect was conducted to the hall in procession headed by an Indian band, on arrival at the hall was greeted with shouts of Bande Mataram. A trio of volunteers sang a national song, the whole house standing. Mr. Raghava Row, Chairman, Reception committee, opened the proceedings with the address of welcome to the delegates. Mr. N. Subba Row of Rajahmundry proposed Rap Bahadur Mr. Audinarayan Iah to the chair and was seconded by Mr. K. Hervazn of Cocanada. Mr. Subba Row referred to the fact that this was the first conference under the new constitution and Madras deserved credit. The President then delivered an eloquent address.

THE KALMA ARMED ACT CASE.—This case has been adjourned to 30th June.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The Message of India

The ground gained by the Vedantic propaganda in the West, may be measured by the growing insight in the occasional utterances of well-informed and intellectual Europeans on the subject. A certain Mrs. Leighton Cleather speaking to the Oriental circle of the Lyceum Club in London on the message of India has indicated the mission of India with great justness and insight. We need not follow Mrs. Cleather into her dissertation on the Kshatriyas, whom for some mysterious reason she insists on calling the Kshatriyas, but it is true that the first knowledge of Vedantic truth and the Rajayoga was the possession of the Kshatriyas till Janaka, Ajatashatru and others gave it to the Brahmins. But the real issues of this historical fact are inevitably missed by the lecturer. She is on a surer ground when she continues, "India's message to the world to-day she considered to be the realisation of the life beyond material forms. The East has taken for granted the reality of the invisible and has no fear. The recognition of the soul in ourselves and others leads to the recognition of the universal soul and the great word of the Upanishads: 'This soul which is the self of all that is, this is the real, this the self, that thou art.' Modern civilisation had lost sight of the fundamental law of self-sacrifice as conditioning man's evolution."

We have here, very briefly put, the triple message of India, physical, spiritual and moral. India believes in and has the key to a physical world within man and without him which is the source and basis of the material. This it is which Europe is beginning dimly to discover. She has caught glimpses of the world beyond the gates, her hands are fumbling for the key, but she has not yet found it. Immortality proved and admitted, it becomes easier to believe in God. The spiritual message is that the universal self is one and that our souls are not only brothers, not only of one substance and nature, but live in and move towards an essential oneness. It follows that Love is the highest law and that to which evolution must move. Ananda, joy and delight, are the object of the lila and the fulfilment of love is the height of joy and delight. Self-sacrifice is therefore the fundamental law. Sacrifice, says the Gita, is the law by which the Father of all in the beginning conditioned the world, and all ethics, all conduct, all life is a sacrifice willed or unconscious. The beginning of ethical knowledge is to realise this and make the conscious sacrifice of one's own individual desires. It is an inferior and semi-savage morality which gives up only to gain and makes selfishness the basis of ethics. To give up one's small individual self and find the larger self in others, in the nation, in humanity, in God, that is the law of Vedanta. That is India's message. Only she must not be content with sending it, she must rise up and live it before all the world so that it may be proved a possible law of conduct both for men and nations.

Lord Honest John

On the converse side a passage from Mr. Algernon Cecil's "Six Oxford Thinkers" is instructive. He dwells on the self-contradictory and ironic case of John Morley's life. He the philosophic Liberal, the ardent advocate of Home Rule, the persistent foe of war and coercion, is closing his fine record of public service with a coronet on his head as the ruler of India, of the child of Clive and Warren Hastings, of the creature of strife and fraud; as one might say, a benevolent despot in an absolute constitution imposed and administered by an alien race." We in India are sure of the despotism but have some doubts about the benevolence. Nor can we accept the phrase, absolute constitution, as anything but an oxymoron, a "witty folly" a happy and ironical contradiction in terms. But for the rest the implied criticism is just.

The Failure of Europe

Mr. Cecil sees in this ending of Honest John as Lord Morley the failure of Liberalism, and it must be remembered that the failure of Liberalism means the abandonment of the gospel of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity as a thing unlivable, and that again means the moral bankruptcy of Europe. "Liberalism in any intelligible sense cannot last another generation. In a score of years the strange adventure on which the nations of Europe embarked in 1879 will be concluded, and we shall revert, doubtless with many and formidable changes, to an earlier type. The principles of unchecked individual liberty and unrestricted competition have, to use the ancient phrase, been tried in the balance and found wanting. The golden dreams which so lately cheated the anxious eyes of men have tarnished with time. Their splendour has proved illusive and they have gone the way of other philosophies down a road upon which there is no returning. The old aristocrats have been swept away and some malicious spirit has given us new ones bathed in the most material sort of golden splendour. And Misery, Vice and Discontent stalk among the drudges of society much as they did before." Mr. Cecil like most Europeans sees that European liberalism has failed but like most Europeans utterly misses the real reason of the failure. The principles of 1879 were not false, but they were falsely stated and selfishly executed. Europe had not the spiritual strength, nor the moral force to carry them out. She was too selfish, too short-sighted, too materialistic and ignorant. She deserved to fail and could not but fail. It is left for Asia and especially for India to reconstruct the world.

BRITISH FEARS:—The genesis of the Imperial Press Conference is to be found in that feeling of insecurity which is driving England to seek allies on the Continent and gather round her the children of her loins beyond the seas. During the better part of the nineteenth century after her triumph over Napoleon and her amazing expansion in India, she felt too strong to need extraneous assistance. Mistress of the seas, enormously wealthy, monopolist almost of the world's commerce, she followed on the Continent a policy of splendid isolation broken only by the ill-starred alliance with the third Napoleon. She fought for her own hand everywhere and felt strong enough to conquer. Her Colonies she regarded only as a nuisance. They were a moral asset, probably, but hardly a material. They assisted her in no way, they excluded her commerce by tariffs, they took her protection without payment and yet exacted internal independence with an inordinate and querulous jealousy of her interference and unwillingness to allow even the slightest iota of British control to mar the perfection of her autonomy. But a change has come over the spirit of her dream. Mighty powers have arisen in the world, young, ardent, ambitious, rapidly expanding, magnificently equipped moving with the sureness and swiftness of material forces towards empire and aggrandisement. Their armies are gigantic forces against which England's would be as helpless as a boy in the hands of a Titan. Their wealth increases. They are beating England out of the chosen fields of her commercial expansion, and it is only by bringing out all the reserves of her old energy that she can just keep a first place; worst of all, their navies grow and if they cannot keep pace with her in numbers, equal it in efficiency. On the other hand India, her passive source of wealth, strength and prestige is struggling in her turn to exclude British commerce and assert autonomy without British control. England is uneasy; she cannot slumber at night for thinking of her precarious future. To her excited imagination German airships fill the skies and myriad tramp of the Teuton is heard already marching on London, while huge conspiracies spring up like mushrooms in India and evade the eager grasp of the Police with a diabolical skill which leaves behind only arrests and persecution of innocent men, hard judicial comments, a discredited C. I. D. and a desperate weeping Englishman. One can no longer recognise the strong, stolid, practical, invincible Britisher in the emotional, hysterical, excitable, panic-stricken race dancing to the tune of its newly liberated Imagination.

THE JOURNALISTIC WAR COUNCIL:—It is not surprising under such circumstances that leading Englishmen should call a Press Conference and turn it into a War Council full of such themes as military conscription and naval expansion and always looking out of the corner its eye at Imperial Federation. The aid and backing of the Colonies has now become a necessity to British imagination. England seeks an American alliance and hungers after the unity of the Anglo-Saxon world, but there are hostile elements in America which militate against that dream. Parting with her old friends of the Triple Alliance she embraces France, her ancient and traditional enemy; she courts her bug-bear Russia and many of her publicists are ready to excuse and condone the most savage, merciless and inhuman system of tyranny in the world provided she gets a friend in need. But these are uncertain and transitory supports, while the Colonies are bound by ties of blood and interest. The objective of the Press Conference is therefore the Colonies, the union of the English throughout the Empire. And although Srijut Surendra Nath has been led to the gathering in gilded fetters and is "the most picturesque figure" in the Conference, that is all he is, a picture, even if a speaking picture, —nothing else. For the rest it is Anglo-India that has been called to the great journalistic War Council, not India. The real India has no place there. We wish Srijut Surendra Nath could have realised it. It might have prevented him from indulging in rhetorical hyperboles about "the wise and conciliatory policy of Lord Morley"—forgetful of the nine deportees, forgetful of the many good and true men in jail for Swadeshi, forgetful of Midnapore and all it typifies.

FORGOTTEN EVENTUALITIES:—It is strange that British statesmanship should be blind to certain possibilities which will follow from their new Colonial policy. Among the first results of the new idea has been the federation of Australia and the federation of South Africa. The former event is not of such importance to the world as the latter. The referendum in Natal is indeed an event of the first significance; but what it portends is the rise of a new and vigorous nation, perhaps a new empire in South Africa,—certainly not the consolidation of the British Empire. Great organisms like these tend inevitably to separate existence. The one thing that stands in the way is the present inability of these organisms to defend their separate existence. Australia lies under the outstretched sword of Japan to say nothing of the subtler, less apparent but more ominous menace of Germany. Canada is kept to England by the contiguity of a powerful, well-organized and expanding foreign State. South Africa on the other hand is occupied by a strong military race, with a stubborn love of independence in its very blood. In the last war it has become aware of its supreme military capacity, but also of its inability to hold its freedom without a navy. Yet the main cry of England now is that the Colonies should organise military and naval defence in order to lighten the burden of England and help her in her wars! They are not satisfied with the contribution of a Dreadnought. They want an Australian navy, a South African navy. Surely God has sealed up the eyes and wits of these Imperialistic statesmen. They have eyes but they cannot see; they have minds but they are allowed only to misuse them.

NATIONAL VITALITY:—Nothing is stranger than the difference presented by Europe and Asia in the matter of national vitality. European nations seem to have a brief date, a life—term vigorous but soon-exhausted; Asiatic races persist and survive. It was not so in old times. Not only Greece and Rome perished, Assyria, Chaldea, Phoenicia are also written in the book of the Dead. But the difference now seems well-established. France is a visibly dying nation, Spain seems to have lost the power of revival, Italy and Greece have been lifted up by great efforts and sacrifices but show a weak vitality, the Anglo-Saxon race is beginning everywhere to recede and dwindle. On the other hand in Asia life pulsates victoriously. Japan has risen to one bound to the first rank of nations; China untou-shed by her calamities renovates her huge national life. The effect on India, of an accumulation of almost all the conditions which bring about national death, has been a new lease of life and a great dynamic impulse. Of the Mahomedan races, not a single one is decadent. Persia rises from her weakness full of youthful enthusiasm and courage though not yet of capacity. Arabia in her deserts surges with life. Egypt after her calamities is undergoing new birth; as far as Morocco the stir of life is seen. And to-day Turkey the sick man, has suddenly risen up vigorous and whole. What is the source of this difference? Is it not in this that Asia has developed her spirituality and Europe has turned from it? Europe has always tended to live more in matter and in the body than within; and matter when not inert is always changing; the body is bound to perish. The high pressure at which Europe lives only tends to disintegrate the body more rapidly when the spiritual sources within are not resorted to for stability.

THE AWAKENING SOUL OF INDIA.

No national awakening is really vital and enduring which confines itself to a single field. It is when the soul awakens that a nation is really alive, and the life will then manifest itself in all the manifold forms of activity in which man seeks to express the strength and delight of the expansive Spirit within. It is for ananda that the world exists; for joy that the Self puts Himself into the great and serious game of life; and the joy which He sees is the joy of various self-expression. For this reason it is that no two men are alike, no two nations are alike. Each has its own separate nature over and above the common nature of humanity and it is not only the common human impulses and activities but the satisfaction and development of its own separate character and capacities that a nation demands. Denied that satisfaction and development it perishes. By two tests therefore the vitality of a national movement can be judged. If it is imitative, imported, artificial then whatever temporary success it may have, the nation is moving towards self-sterilisation and death;—even so the nations of ancient Europe perished when they gave up their own individuality as the price of Roman civilisation, Roman peace, Roman prosperity. If, on the other hand, the peculiar individuality of a race stamps itself on the movement in its every part and sizes on every new development as a means of self-expression, then the nation wakes, lives and grows and whatever the revolutions and changes of political, social, or intellectual forms and institutions, it is assured of its survival and aggrandisement.

The nineteenth century in India was imitative, self-forgetful, artificial. It aimed at a successful reproduction of Europe in India, forgetting the deep saying of the Gita:—"Better the law of one's own being though it be badly done than an alien dharma well-followed: death in one's own dharma is better, it is a dangerous thing to follow the law of another's nature." For death in one's own dharma brings new birth, success in an alien path means only successful suicide. If we had succeeded in Europeanising ourselves we would have lost for ever our spiritual capacity, our intellectual force, our national elasticity and power of self-renewal. That tragedy has been enacted more than once in history, only the worst and most mournful example of all would have been added. Had the whole activity of the country been of the derivative and alien kind that result would have supervened. But the life-breath of the nation still moved in the religious movements of Bengal and the Panjab, in the political aspirations of Maharashtra and in the literary activity of Bengal. Even here it was an undercurrent, the peculiar temperament and vitality of India struggling for self-preservation under a load of foreign ideas and foreign forms and it was not till, in the struggle between these two elements, the balance turned in the favour of the national dharma that the salvation of India was assured. The resistance of the conservative element in Hinduism, tamasic, inert, ignorant, uncreative though it was, saved the country by preventing an even more rapid and thorough disintegration than actually took place and by giving respite and time for the persistent national self to emerge and find itself. It was in religion first that the soul of India awoke and triumphed. There were always indications, always great forerunners, but it was when the flower of the educated youth of Calcutta bowed down at the feet of an illiterate Hindu ascetic, a self-illuminated extatic and "mystic" without a single trace or touch of the alien thought or education upon him that the battle was won. The going forth of Vivekananda, marked out by the Master as the heroic soul destined to take the world between his two hands and change it was the first visible sign to the World that India was awake not only to survive but to conquer. Afterwards when the awakening was complete a section of the nationalist movement turned in imagination to a reconstruction of the recent pre-British past in all its details. This could not be. Inertia, the refusal to expand and alter is what our philosophy calls "tamas", and an excess of "tamas" tends to disintegration and disappearance. Aggression is necessary for self-preservation and when a force ceases to conquer, it ceases to live—that which remains stationary and stands merely on the defensive, that which retires into and keeps within its own "kot" or base, as the now defunct "Sandhya" used graphically to put it, is doomed to defeat, diminution and final elimination from the living things of the world. Hinduism has always been pliable and aggressive; it has thrown itself on the attacking force, carried its positions, plundered its treasures, made its own everything of value it had and ended either in wholly annexing it or driving it out by rendering its further continuation in the country purposeless and therefore impossible. Whenever it has stood on the defensive, it has contracted within narrower limits and showed temporary signs of decay.

Once the soul of the nation was awake in religion it was only a matter of time and opportunity for it to throw itself on all spiritual and intellectual activities in the national existence and take possession of them. The outburst of anti-European feeling which followed on the Partition gave the required opportunity. Anger, vindictiveness and antipathy are not in themselves laudable feelings, but God uses them for His purposes and brings good out of evil. They drove listlessness and apathy away and replaced them by energy and a powerful emotion; and that energy and emotion were seized upon by the national Self and turned to the uses of the future. The anger against Europeans, the vengeful turning upon their commerce and its productions, the antipathy to everything associated with them engendered a powerful stream of tendency turning away from the immediate Anglicised past, and the spirit which had already declared itself in our religious life entered in by this broad doorway into politics and substituted a positive powerful yearning towards the national past, a still more mighty and dynamic yearning towards a truly national future. The Indian spirit has not yet conquered the whole field of our politics in actuality, but it is there victoriously in sentiment; the rest is a matter of time, and everything which is now happening in politics, is helping to prepare for its true and potent expression. The future is now assured. Religion and politics, the two most effective and vital expressions of the nation's self having been nationalized, the rest will follow in due course. The needs of our religious and political life are now vital and real forces and it is these needs which will reconstruct our society, recreate and remould our industrial and commercial life and found a new and victorious art, literature, science and philosophy which will be not European but Indian.

The impulse is already working in Bengali art and literature. The need of self-expression for the national spirit in politics suddenly brought back Bengali literature to its essential and eternal self, and it was in our recent national songs that this self-realisation came. The lyric and the lyrical spirit, the spirit of simple, direct and poignant expression, of deep, passionate, straightforward emotion, of a frank, and exalted enthusiasm, the dominant note of love and "Bhakti" of a mingled sweetness and strength, the potent intellect dominated by the self-illuminated heart, a mystical exaltation of feeling and spiritual insight expressing itself with a plain concreteness and practicality, this is the soul of Bengal. All our literature in order to be wholly alive must start from this base and whatever variations it may indulge in, never lose touch with it. In Bengal again the national spirit is seeking to satisfy itself in art and for the first time since the decline of the Moghuls a new school of national art is developing itself, the school of which Abanindranath Tagore is the founder and master. It is still troubled by the foreign thought, Asiatic influence from which its master started and has something of an exotic appearance, but the development and self-emancipation of the national self from this temporary domination can already be watched and followed. There again it is the spirit of Bengal that expresses itself. The attempt to express in form and limit something of that which is formless and illimitable, is the attempt of Indian art. The Greeks aiming at smaller and more easily attainable end, achieved a more perfect success. Their instinct for form was greater than ours, our instinct for colour was superior. Our future art must solve the problem of expressing the soul in the object, the great Indian aim, while achieving the triumphant combination of perfect form and colour. No Indian has so strong an instinct for form as the Bengali. In addition to the innate Vedantism of all Indian races he has an all-powerful impulse towards delicacy, grace and strength, and it is these qualities to which the new school of art has instinctively turned in its first inception. Unable to find a perfect model in the scanty relics of old Indian art, it was only natural that it should turn to Japan for help, for delicacy and grace are there triumphant. But Japan has not the secret of expressing the soul in the object, it has not the aim. And the Bengali spirit means more than the union of delicacy, grace and strength; it has the lyrical mystic impulse; it has the passion for clarity and concreteness, and as in our literature, so in our art we see these tendencies emerging—an emotion of beauty, a nameless sweetness and spirituality pervading the clear line and form. Here too it is the free spirit of the nation beginning to emancipate itself from the foreign limitations and shackles.

No department of our life can escape this great regenerating and reconstructing force. There is not the slightest doubt that our society will have to undergo a reconstruction which may amount to revolution, but it will not be for Europeanisation as the average reformer blindly hopes, but for a greater and more perfect realisation of the national spirit in society. Not individual selfishness and mutually consuming struggle, but love and the binding of individuals into a single inseparable life is the national impulse. It ought to fulfil itself in the past by the bond of blood in the joint family, by the bond of a partial communism in the village system, by the bond of birth and a corporate sense of honour in the caste. It may seek a more perfect and spiritual bond in the future. In commerce also so long as we follow the European spirit and European model, the individual competitive selfishness, the bond of mere interest in the joint stock company or that worst and most dangerous development of co-operative Capitalism, the giant octopus like Trust and Syndicate, we shall never succeed in rebuilding a healthy industrial life. It is not these bonds which can weld Indians together. India moves to a deeper and greater life than the world has yet imagined possible and it is when she has found the secret of expressing herself in these various activities that her industrial and social life will become strong and expansive.

Nationalism has been hitherto largely a revolt against the tendency to shape ourselves into the mould of Europe; but it must also be on its guard against any tendency to cling to every detail that has been Indian. That has not been the spirit of Hinduism in the past, there is no reason why it should be so in the future. In all life there are three elements, the fixed and permanent spirit, the developing yet constant soul and the brittle changeable body. The spirit we cannot change, we can only obscure or lose; the soul must not be rashly meddled with, must neither be tortured into a shape alien to it, nor obstructed in its free expansion; and the body must be used as a means, not over-cherished as a thing valuable for its own sake. We will sacrifice no ancient form to an unreasoning love of change, we will keep none which the national spirit desires to replace by one that is a still better and truer expression of the undying soul of the nation.

MAN-SLAVE OR FREE ?

The exclusive pursuit of Yoga by men who seclude themselves either physically or mentally from the contact of the world has led to an erroneous view of this science as something mystic far-off and unreal. The secrecy which has been observed with regard to Yogic practices,—a necessary secrecy in the former stages of human evolution—has stereotyped this error. Practices followed by men who form secret circles and confine the instruction in the mysteries strictly to those who have a certain preparatory fitness, inevitably bear the stamp to the outside world of occultism. In reality there is nothing intrinsically hidden, occult or mystic about Yoga. Yoga is based upon certain laws of human psychology, a certain knowledge about the power of the mind over the body and the inner spirit over the mind which are not generally realised and have hitherto been considered by those in the secret too momentous in their consequences for disclosure until men should be trained to use them aright. Just as a set of men who had discovered and tested the uttermost possibilities of mesmerism and hypnotism might hesitate to divulge them freely to the world, lest the hypnotic power should be misused by ignorance or perversity or abused in the interests of selfishness and crime, so the Yogins have usually preserved the knowledge of these much greater forces within us in a secrecy broken only when they were sure of the previous ethical and spiritual training of the neophyte and his physical and moral fitness for the Yogic practices. It became therefore an established rule for the learner to observe strict reserve as to the inner experiences of Yoga and for the developed Yogin as far as possible to conceal himself. This has not prevented treatises and manuals from being published dealing with the physical or with the moral and intellectual sides of Yoga. Nor has it prevented great spirits who have gained their Yoga not by the ordinary careful and scientific methods but by their own strength and the special grace of God, from revealing themselves and their spiritual knowledge to mankind and in their intense love for humanity imparting something of their power to the world. Such were Buddha, Christ, Mahomed, Chaitanya, such have been Ramkrishna and Vivekananda. It is still the orthodox view that the experiences of Yoga must not be revealed to the uninitiated. But a new era dawns upon us in which the old laws must be modified. Already the West is beginning to discover the secrets of Yoga. Some of its laws have revealed themselves however dimly and imperfectly to the scientists of Europe while others through Spiritualism, Christian Science, Clairvoyance telepathy and other modern forms of occultism are being almost discovered by accident as if by men groping in the dark and stumbling over truths they cannot understand. The time has almost come when India can no longer keep her light to herself but must pour it out upon the world. Yoga must be revealed to mankind because without it mankind cannot take the next step in the human evolution.

The psychology of the human race has not yet been discovered by Science. All creation is essentially the same and proceeds by similar though not identical laws. If therefore we see in the outside material world that all phenomena proceed from and can be reduced to a single causal substance from which they were born, in which they move and to which they return, the same truth is likely to hold good in the psychical world. The unity of the material universe has now been acknowledged by the scientific intellect of Europe and the high priests of atheism and materialism in Germany have declared the "cham evadootyam" in matter with no uncertain voice. In so doing they have merely reaffirmed the discovery made by Indian masters of the Yogic science thousands of years ago. But the European scientists have not discovered any sure and certain methods, such as they have in dealing with gross matter, for investigating psychical phenomena. They can only observe the most external manifestations of mind in action. But in these manifestations the mind is so much enveloped in the action of the outer objects and seems so dependent on them that it is very difficult for the observer to find out the springs of its action or any regularity in its workings. The European scientists have therefore come to the conclusion that it is the stimulations of outside objects which are the cause of psychical phenomena, and that even when the mind seems to act of itself and on its own material it is only associating, grouping together and manipulating the recorded experiences from outside objects. The very nature of mind is, according to them, a creation of past material experience transmitted by heredity with such persistence that we have grown steadily from the savage with his rudimentary mind to the civilized man of the twentieth century. As a natural result of these materialistic theories, science has found it difficult to discover any true psychical centre for the multifarious phenomena of mind and has therefore fixed upon the brain, the material organ of thought, as the only real centre. From this materialistic philosophy have resulted certain theories very dangerous to the moral future of mankind. First, man is a creation and slave of matter. He can only master matter by obeying it. Secondly, the mind itself is a form of gross matter and not independent of and master of the senses. Thirdly, there is no real free will, because all our action is determined by two great forces, heredity and environment. We are the slaves of our nature, and where we seem to be free from its mastery, it is because we are yet worse slaves of our environment, worked on by the forces that surround and manipulate us.

It is from these false and dangerous doctrines of materialism which tend to subvert man's future and hamper his evolution, that Yoga gives up a means of escape. It asserts on the contrary man's freedom from matter and gives him a means of asserting that freedom. The first great fundamental discovery of the Yogins was a means of analysing the experiences of the mind and the heart. By Yoga one can isolate mind, watch its workings as under a microscope, separate every minute function of the various parts of the "antahkarana", the inner organ, every mental and moral faculty, test its isolated workings as well as its relations to other functions and faculties and trace backwards the operations of mind to subtler and ever subtler sources until just as material analysis arrives at a primal entity from which all proceeds, so Yoga analysis arrives at a primal spiritual entity from which all proceeds. It is also able to locate and distinguish the psychical centre to which all psychical phenomena gather and so to fix the roots of personality. In this analysis its first discovery is that mind can entirely isolate itself from external objects and work in itself and of itself. This does not, it is true, carry us very far because it may be that it is merely using the material already stored up by its past experiences. But the next discovery is that the farther it removes itself from objects, the more powerfully, surely, rapidly can the mind work, with a swifter clarity, with a victorious and sovereign detachment. This is an experience which tends to contradict the scientific theory that mind can withdraw the senses into itself and bring them to bear on a mass of phenomena of which it is quite unaware when it is occupied with external phenomena. Science will naturally challenge these as hallucinations. The answer is that these phenomena are related to each other by regular, simple and intelligible laws and form a world of their own independent of thought acting on the material world. Here too Science has this possible answer that this supposed world is merely an imaginative reflex in the brain of the material world and to any argument drawn from the definiteness and unexpectedness of these subtle phenomena and their independence of our own will and imagination it can always oppose its theory of unconscious cerebration as we suppose unconscious imagination. The fourth discovery is that mind not only independent of external matter but its master; it can not only reject and control external stimuli, but can defy such apparently universal material laws as that of gravitation and ignore, put aside and make nought of what are called laws of nature, and are really only the laws of material nature, inferior and subject to the psychical laws because matter is product of mind and not mind a product of matter. This is the decisive discovery.

covery of "Yoga", its final contradiction of materialism. It is followed by the crowning realisation that there is within us a source of immeasurable force immeasurable intelligence, immeasurable joy far above the possibility of weakness, above the possibility of ignorance, above the possibility of grief which we can bring into touch with ourselves and, under arduous but not impossible conditions, habitually utilize or enjoy. This is what the Upanishads call the Brahman and the primal entity from which all things were born, in which they live and to which they return. This is lod and communion with Him is the highest aim of Yoga—a communion which works for knowledge for work, for delight.

NATIONAL SONGS OF BENGAL.

The life of a nation is always manifest through its literature. Poetry, music and the drama are the surest and most unmistakable proofs of the thought-currents of a nation. As there are various periods in the history of a nation, marked by various events and movements, so there are the different periods in literature—each corresponding to a historical stage. The predominant thoughts and ideas of each epoch in the historical evolution of a nation can always be discovered through its songs, its dramas, its general literature. All historical movements are essentially movements of thought, and in one sense poets and thinkers are more responsible for historical events than the mere men of action. The history of the general literature of Europe abounds with this close connection between the outer life of the nation and the expression of its inner life. But we need not go beyond the National Songs that Bengal has produced from time to time.

There were National Songs in Bengal about 20 or 30 years ago, but how different to those of to-day in thought, in feeling, in realism. The patriotism of a quarter of a century ago was a sort of vague indefinite love for India, more sentimental than emotional, and therefore unreal. We were drunk with the wine of European civilization. Our one desire was to transplant Europe into India. European ideals were the criterion of all ambition. Therefore when we read that patriotism was almost a religion in the west, we thought, it was a sign of respectability, and we convinced ourselves that we were patriotic too. We sang

कि भय, कि भय, माँची भारतैर जय।”

“Sing the praise of India, what fear is there, sing the praise of India.” We were anxious to prove that we too loved our country and sang her praises. There was a patriotic touch in it no doubt, but a purely sentimental one, and coming, as it did, from a nation steeped from head to foot in Anti-India ideas, how low, how unreal it sounded!

There was a love for India in those days, but a love through western eyes, for a westernised India. We read of Europe—a great, glorious, free people, and in our mind's eye we pictured another Europe in India, loved it and sang of it. Naturally there was despair and pessimism for there never was a more impossible, a more utopian dream than that of a westernised India! Then we sang:—

“एनि चमकार ए भारतभूमि।
तुमि पिता तारे केहे मेह तुमि।”

“What a darkness it is, this land of India, hast thou forsaken it then, oh our father.”

“मलिन मुख चन्दना मारत तोमारि, राव दिवा भरिहे सोचन बारि।”

“Pale is the beauty of thy face, O India, night and day from thine eyes the tears are falling.”

That was the patriotism of 20 years ago and our singers faithfully reproduced it in their songs. It was wholly artificial and unreal. We indulged in noble fancies without the slightest reference to the actualities of life—without the slightest knowledge of our history and traditions.

A different note is struck in the national songs of this, the new period of our history. Here there is no despair, no pessimism? we no longer see our mother, weeping, sad or gloomy!

तोमार देखे देखे नयन ना फिरे,

तोमार दुयार बाजि खुले गेहे सोमार मन्दिर।”

“Oh Mother, we look at thee and look again and our eyes cannot turn from gazing upon thee. Thy doors have opened today into thy golden temple.” Nationalism has brought to our people an outburst of triumphant hope and our mother appears to us, not with her tresses dishevelled and her head bowed in sorrow, but radiant, glorious, and beautiful. There is not the faintest chord of sorrow in our new national hymnology, there is hope, there is joy, there is faith.

Dreams of a westernised India have vanished, we will have none of it. We love our mother as she is.

“भावेर देबोदा मे टा कापड़, सायाय तुमि मेरे भाव।”

“Take, the rough coarse cloth that our mother gives us, as a blessing, O my brother.”

Here there is no artificiality, not merely a music of words that characterised the songs of the last period. There is real depth of feeling.

“ओ आमार देशेर माटि, तोमार परे ठेकाइ माया, तोमनि विश्वासिदर आंचल दाता।”

“Oh soil of my country I press my face upon thee and I feel spread out in thee the raiments hem of the universal mother.”

आमार सोमार बांझ, आमि तोमाय बड़ भावबासि, धिरदिन सोमार बाकाग, तोमार बाताय, आमार प्राये बाजाय बाँधी।”

“Oh my golden Bengal, very dearly do I love thee ever thy heavens and thy air awake a music of gladness in my heart.”

But this is not all. Not merely do we love our mother land as she exists today and derive exquisite joy from that love, but more than that, we are proud of her. We are proud that we are her sons, we are proud that we have such a mother.

बाचल जनन जानी, तोमाय भावबेसी।”

“Blessed am I in my birth that I have been born in this land, blessed am I in my life that I have loved thee—Oh my mother.”

The agnostic cynicism that the purely intellectual teaching of the west led us into has altogether disappeared. We are no longer doubters and cynic. We no longer cry.

बारिदिकि बाजि माँच हरि गति,
बाजि ये चापुय, बड़हाय बति,
बाजि ए आचरि, दिवद पावारी,
बाजार चरच चरिच।”

“We look to all sides, but find no salvation, we are utterly forsaken and alone and find no refuge in this darkness and surge of calamity today, to whose feet shall we cling to.”

We say rather,

“कोबा से तोर दमिद बेग, कोबा से तोर मलिन हासि, बाकाये बाजि बड़िगे गेन ए चरचर दीपति राखी।”

Where today is thy poor attire, where today is thy pale and clouded smile, the light and beauty of thy feet have filled heaven with their radiance.”

“प्रवार तोर मरा गाहे बाण पसेहि
जय मा बली भासा तरी।”

“This time the waters had poured into the dead Ganges of thy life; launch, launch thy boat with the shout of victory.”

But although we have learned to have faith in ourselves and in the sanctity of our movement, although our goal is in view and we have caught more than a glimpse of it, yet we needs must suffer for our cause. Without suffering the godhead in us cannot grow. That suffering is an essential factor and we must proceed without any fear.

Be not ashamed, be not afraid conquer all weakness, master thyself.”

“तोर चापन जने काकड़े तोरे, ता बली भावना करा चल्बेना

“Though all who are dear to you forsake you, it will not do to falter and pause for that.”

“बड़ दुयार देखि बली, असनि कि तुड़ बाजि बली, ओ तोर करे बारे ठेकते हरे, हयत रे बार टरवे ना—
ता बली भावना करा चल्बे ना।”

“Will you come back because you find the door shut to you? you must push at it again and again. It may be the door will remain immovable” it will not do to falter and pause for that.”

And that suffering will bring us victory—nay more, the greater the suffering the sooner will the goal be reached.

बीदिर बाजि वन मज्जन हरे, बीदिर बाजि तन दुदवे।”

"The feignest their eyes glare upon us, the sooner our eyes will be opened the tighter they draw the cords that bind us the sooner our bonds will be broken."

And then there is that absolute faith that no obstacles or difficulties can shake—the faith that our goal is at hand. It will be attained, it must be attained. The result of our Sadhana will be realised.

"निशि दिन भरका राखि कीरे मन उषर उषे,

Day and night cherish this faith, my best, at even we must and shall do it, if we are sworn to the task and clear that with shall and and fulfil itself."

Such then is the hymnody of the present period of Indian History, a free love of the mother-land a love for her sorrows as well as for her vices as well as virtues a love for her she exists today. The physical beauty and the moral elevation of the motherland has been seldom, if even, so wonderfully interwoven with the national literature of any other country. The love every creek and corner, every hill and dale of our motherland. She is to us the manifestation of the divinity. She is the mantra of our yoga and sadhana.

तुमै बामार, बामार देवा ।"

"O my goddess, O my Sadhana, O my Paradise my motherland!"

SUCCESS OF SWADESHI-BOYCOTT IN INDIA: VIEWS OF THE MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

We have noticed how throughout the last year the Swadeshi-Boycott movement gained ground and in consequence British piece-goods trade lost hold in India. Even the Anglo-Indian papers could not help commenting, from time to time, on the loss suffered by Manchester owing to the success of the Movement, and specially the Dewali and Lucky-Day Sales were among topics for discussion to them at least for a time. The Official reports of Districts and Provinces also were full of significance on the subject. But the latest testimony to the success of the Movement comes from England itself. At the last annual meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, F. Ashworth, in his Presidential address, remarked:—"Our exports of cotton manufactures in the first half of 1908, compared with the corresponding months of 1907, showed a falling in value of £2,600,000, but matters were at much worse in the second half of 1908, the contraction of trade compared with the same period in the previous year being £12,740,000."

In this connection it will be interesting to hear from the mouth of the President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce what part India played in the above total contraction of Manchester's piece goods trade and what her corresponding increase in production and consumption of home-made articles was, and here we have the following unreserved observations of Mr. Ashworth on the point. He said: "The growth of home-production of cotton goods in India is becoming a factor of increasing importance in relation to our trade with that country. The "Swadeshi" movement has established a marked preference for Indian made cloths in some districts, and has thus stimulated manufacturing enterprise. In two years the recorded number of power-looms in work has increased 25 per cent from 52,200 to 65,700. Thirteen new textile concerns were registered during the last official year. The production of cotton cloth in Indian mills for the year ending March, 1908 is given as 189 million pounds that is equivalent to 945 million yards. Taking our exports to India as 2,350 million yards average, the relative proportions imported and home made-cloth were therefore respectively about 70 per cent and 30 per cent. Again, the statistics of spinning and weaving in India (both British India and United States) during the last ten months, April, 1908 to January, 1909, show an output of 546 million pounds against 533 million pounds for the same period of the year 1907 to 1908.

A further light on the success of Swadeshi-Boycott is thrown by the following lines of the "London Times" in a recent review of the world's trade of 1908. It says:—

So great was the depression in Lancashire that the official returns show that about 500 mills stopped, while 160 were working, and that £50,000,000 of capital was lying idle. Over 400,000 operatives were out of work; and the weekly loss in wages was about £330,000. Even after the mill again began to run, it was found that the stoppage had not been long enough to ease completely the overstocked markets; for many weeks after work was resumed, spinners complained that they had no margin of profits, and that a prolongation of the lockout would have been beneficial. In the last lean year 1904, Bombay had to suffer a great deal; some mills were working only for a short time and some were even on the verge of being put for sale. But since the birth of the Swadeshi-boycott movement, the mills have been working incessantly, and in 1908 were unable to supply the demand. It is this movement that saved the Bombay mill in 1908 from the disaster which well nigh had befallen them in 1904. Notwithstanding the depression throughout the whole manufacturing world Bombay mills are now safe in their positions. This general depression has not had any telling effect on the share-market, wages, and industrial gains in Bombay chiefly owing to the prevalence of the Swadeshi-boycott movement in the country. The rich Bombay Mill owner unmindful of the depression abroad, is busy increasing his spindles and looms and is calculating his well earned profits in all ease and comfort under the blessings of the Swadeshi boycott movement. "The Dawn."

PROF. LEES SMITH ON INDIA.

SPEECH TO YOUNG SCOTS.

The Ninth Annual Conference of the Scots Society was held on Saturday 24th April last in the Guild Hall Perth and was attended by about 60 representative delegates from the various branches in all parts of Scotland. The office-bearers were elected for the year and thereafter resolutions bearing on current politics sent up by the branches were considered and confirmed. Mr. Robert Hay, President of the Society was in the Chair. Professor H. B. Lees-Smith of Ruskin College, Oxford, and the London School of Economics moved the following resolution sent up by the Edinburgh Centre.

"That this conference desires to record its appreciation of Viscount Morley's wisdom and courage in appointing a native Indian to the Executive Council of the Indian Empire as vindicating the proclaimed intentions of two British Sovereigns. Further desires to commend the wise statesmanship which despite the present political unrest in India, seeks in Liberal principles to join the people of India with us in the Government of that great Dominion. Trusts Viscount Morley will withstand the House of Lords, present attitude to the Councils Bill seeing it has the full approval both of the Government of India and of the elected representatives of the people of Great Britain."

Professor Lees-Smith said the reason he had been invited to submit that motion was that the last Conference he attended and took part in was the Indian National Congress representing the educated opinion of every race and every clime of the dominion, which had met for the purpose of expressing the judgment of the educated classes upon those reforms with which the resolution dealt. It was very clear to him as he watched the proceedings of that Congress that they realised as could not be realised by the people of this country that Lord Morley's Reforms had taken a decisive step at the parting of the ways in Britain's policy with regard to Indian administration. East is East and West is West was a kind of vague general statement which was very popular in India and which had about that measure of half-truth which deluded and bewildered the public mind. In India, of course it meant that the representative institutions of the west had no application to the people of an oriental land. When they said that representative institutions were for ever impossible to the peoples

India, what was it they were actually asserting? Representative institutions depended upon the possession of certain qualities, upon education, honesty and self-control, which would enable the minority to give way to the majority. Were they then going to say that never at any period would the peoples of India be educated, honest or have the capacity for self-control? If they said that it was not only a reflection on the peoples of India, it was the greatest condemnation of the British race personally, he might say that having met these representative men one could not fail to realise the difficulty which lay in their path. He formed a very high idea indeed of the political capacity of the educated India. A visit to their schools made it quite plain that there would be no peoples who would give such magnificent response to educational matters as the peoples of India. The Indian National Congress which he attended compared very favourably indeed for moderation and that sense of compromise which all congresses had learned. He would compare it favourably with the congress of the National Liberal Federation. What Lord Morley has therefore done was boldly and courageously lay down the principle that their ultimate aim in India, however distant it might be was to work towards representative institutions. The day might be far away but they had to look forward to the time when an Indian would be in his country what a Canadian or an Australian was in his. They would have to work in conjunction with the educated-opinion of the land and if with the help of the educated nationalist party they could finally succeed in securing that object a generation hence it would certainly be an achievement in the Government of one race by another to which history would afford no parallel. It would mean that a little people on a small island had stretched out their hands to the ends of the earth and had gradually educated from the depths of barbarism until they could stand level with themselves—no less than three hundred million people, one-third of the human race.

INDUSTRIAL NOTES.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT COMBINE.—Six big American agricultural implement makers have combined together to get control of the Russian market.

DAIRY FARMING.—We are glad to note that dairy farming is now engaging the attention of our educated men. In the country especially in the vicinity of big towns there is ample field for the industry. The question of Calcutta's milk supply has become serious. A few gentlemen—among whom are Srijuts Dwija Dass Dutt and Hemendra Prosad Ghose—have opened dairies near Calcutta.

CATTLE FARM.—The Hissar Cattle Farm, the premier cattle farm of India, should be celebrating its centenary this year. Cattle breeding in India is one of the important and interesting subject of which one wants to hear much, but hears very little. Some time back a cattle expert came out to India from England. But the result is not known. At Pusa there are splendid opportunities which ought not to be overlooked by Indians.

PAPER MAKING.—Mr. J. N. Gupta, C. S., Eastern Bengal, has written an excellent monograph on Paper making and Papier Mache in that Province. The earliest writing materials known to Hindus were palm leaves and birch bark. Palm leaves were comparatively cheap and so gradually displaced the industry in bark paper. The Mahomedans introduced the industry in jute-paper, but this has now been expelled from the market by mill-made paper. There is at present no paper-mill in the Province, the local demand being met from Balli and Serampore. As regards Papier mache the industry is confined to two or three places, and the art known to less than half a dozen persons, so that as Mr. Gupta says, it can hardly be said to constitute an industry. Mr. Gupta concludes his monograph with a few observations on the possibility of starting a paper mill in the province. As in Burma, where, according to Mr. R. W. Sindall, its bamboos and soft wood afford excellent materials for the manufacture of paper, so in Assam there is plenty of soft wood available and plantain fibre. The province imports paper and board of the annual value of Rs. 2½ lakhs. Mr. Gupta is of opinion that suitable sites for the location of a flourishing paper mill can be found in Assam.

General News.

THE MIDNAPORE ENQUIRY.—The Midnapore enquiry is proceeding. Mr. Denham was present for a time.

SRIJUT SYAMSUNDAR CHAKRAVARTY.—News has been received from Srijut Syamsundar Chakravarty that he is suffering from dyspepsia.

SRIJUT AURABINDO GHOSH.—The Daily News publishes the following telegram—dated the 23rd June—Mr. Arabinde Ghose arrived at Barisal, yesterday and addressed a public meeting to-day on the Hindu religion. The lecture lasted more than an hour. The house was crowded to suffocation. Three boys fainted and had to be removed outside.

OURSELVES.—On account of an enormous demand for the first issue of Karmayogin we have run out of stock. To meet the demand of our friends we are going to re-print the issue. Gentlemen who desire to subscribe to the journal from the first issue are requested to write to the Manager at once.

REPRESSION AND REFORM.—On June 23rd there was a grand open-air public meeting in Raja Bahadur's Haveli at Barisal. As soon as Babu Aurobindo Ghose came, enthusiastic shouts of "Bande Mataram" greeted him. Babu Sricharan Sen pleader, at first spoke a few words of welcome to Aurobindo Babu on behalf of the Barisal public. Aurobindo Babu addressed the meeting and spoke for full one hour and a half on repression and reform as two aspects of the same policy. The vast gathering heard the speech in pindrop silence: and even when Aurobindo Babu had concluded his speech, crowds would not disperse but pressed to hear the Bengali version of it. Dr. Tarin Kumar Gupta thanked Aurobindo Babu for the trouble he had taken in coming down to Barisal and addressing the assembly. The meeting then dissolved with "Bande Mataram". A confidential clerk of the Magistrate who is a shorthand writer and the police were in attendance as usual. Aurobindo Babu started for Calcutta the next morning.

A DETONATOR EXPLOSION.—An explosion occurred at Nagpada (Bombay) at seven o'clock on the night of the 23rd June which created panic in the locality. The police on being apprised of the occurrence repaired to the scene and instituted prompt enquiries. It was ascertained that a fitter named Fernand residing in a room in a Chawl was playing with a detonator not knowing that it was charged when it exploded in his left hand blowing off three fingers and causing other minor injuries. On searching his room two more detonators were found. Further enquiries into the matter are progressing.

ALLEGATION AGAINST ARMED POLICE.—Banna Peshakar, of Dhalabazar, within the town of Kishoreganj complained before the S. D. O. alleging that some of the reserve armed police of that town wanted the company of her daughter, Rani Peshakar. The latter refusing admittance, they forced open her door entered the hut and began beating. She took shelter with her mother. The unfortunate woman remonstrating, was mercilessly beaten. They came to the court beamed with blood. The woman could not name the accused, but as she could identify them. They were ordered to go to hospital.

THE KENA UPANISHAD.

1. By whom is the mind impelled or who casts it at its mark? By whose appointment began the primal breath its goings? Who prompts the words that men speak or what God sets eye and ear to their workings?

2. He that is the Ear of the ear, the Mind in mind, the Speech behind the word, the Life of the Breath, the Eye of the eye. Souls unperturbed who put from them the bonds of sense, pass away from this world to become undying.

3. Eye cannot reach Him, Speech cannot find Him, thought cannot attain Him; we have no knowledge of Him, we cannot discover how to teach of Him, for He is other than the known and He is farther than the unknown so have we heard from the men of yore who made what we seek known to us.

4. That which speech develops not but by which speech is developed, know thou that for the Brahman and not this which men adore.

5. That which thinks not with the mind but by which they say mind was thought, know thou that for the Brahman and not this which men adore.

6. That which sees not with the eye but through which the eyes are seen, know thou that for the Brahman and not this which men adore.

7. That which hears not with the ear but by which the ear is made subject to hearing, know thou that for the Brahman and not this which men adore.

8. That which breathes not with the breath but by which the breath is guided, know thou that for the Brahman and not this which men adore.

SECOND PART.

9. If thou thinkest "I know him well, then little indeed dost thou know of the aspect of the Eternal Spirit. What of Him is thou, what of Him is in the gods, this first thou hast to solve. "I think Him known."

10. I think not that I know Him well; I think that I neither know Him nor know Him not. He that knoweth this wisdom of "I neither know Him nor know Him not," he is the one who knoweth.

11. He who thinketh that he hath comprehended Him, comprehendeth Him not; he comprehendeth who knoweth that he hath not known: for He is revealed to the non-knower but to the knower He is concealed.

12. Who comprehendeth the Brahman as the illumination of knowledge, by him is the Brahman realised, for he findeth immortality. By the self he findeth the force to see and by the revelation he findeth immortality.

13. If here thou hast known Him, then hast thou lived, but if thou hast not known God in this thy mortal life, great is thy perdition. The wise who discern him from creature to creature depart from this world to immortality.

THIRD PART.

14. The Spirit conquered for the Gods and they in the Spirit's victory grew great, but they thought "ours is the victory and ours is the greatness.

15. The Spirit knew their thought and manifested Himself before them; but they knew not who was this great Daemon.

16. They said to Fire, "O Master of knowledge, do thou learn who is this Daemon; and he said, "I learn."

17. Fire rushed towards the Spirit, and the Spirit said to him, "Who art thou?" "I am Agni" he said "and I am the Master of the knowledge."

18. "And what is the prowess of thee, Agni?" "All this I can burn, yea, all this that is in the earth and its bounds.

19. Then the Spirit set before him a blade of grass and said "This do thou burn. "And Fire rushed on it with all his speed, yet could he not burn the blade. He ceased, he returned, he said, "I had no strength to learn who is this Daemon."

20. They said to wind, "O Vayou, do thou learn who is this Daemon," and he said, "I learn."

21. Wind rushed towards the Spirit, and the Spirit said to him, "Who art thou?" "I am Vayou" he said "and I am Matariswan, he that dwelleth in the mother of things."

22. "And what is the prowess of thee, Vayou?" "All this I can take, yea, all this that is in the earth and its bounds."

23. "Then Spirit set before him a blade of grass and said "This do thou take". "And Wind rushed on it with all his speed, yet could he not take the blade. He ceased, he returned, he said, "I had no strength to learn who is this Daemon."

24. They said to Indra, "O Maghavan, O Cloud-compeller, do thou learn who is this Daemon." He said "I learn," he rushed towards the Spirit, but the Spirit vanished before him as he came.

25. In the same sky he met the Woman, shining in her beauty, Uma, daughter of the snowy summits. He asked her, "Who is the Daemon?"

FOURTH PART.

26. "He is Brahman: the Eternal Spirit," she said "of the Spirit is the victory by which you are great." Then he knew that this was Brahman.

27. Therefore are these three Gods above all the Gods, Indra, Agni, Vayou, because they came nearest to the touch of Him, (because they first knew that it was Brahman.)

28. Therefore is Indra God above all the Gods in Heaven because he came nearest to the touch of Him, because He first knew that it was Brahman.

29. Lo, the vision of Him is but as the lightning that flashed, as an eyelid's quivering, the vision of Him to the Gods.

30. Then the manner of the vision of Him to the soul; the mind seemeth to go unto the Brahman and by the mind conception again and again remembereth Him.

31. For this verily is that which is desirable and as the desirable let Him be adored; who knoweth thus the Spirit, him all creatures desire.

32. "Tell me an Upanishad, "thou hast said. Lo, the Upanishad! Of the Brahman verily is the Upanishad that we tell thee.

33. Austerity, self-conquest and works, these three are the foundation of the God-knowledge, the Vedas are all her limbs and Truth is her dwelling-place.

34. Whosoever acquireth this God-knowledge, having put from him sin, in the mighty infinite heavens, in the world unending maketh his home eternal yea, eternal.

SRIJUT SYAM SUNDAR CHAKRAVARTI.

(From Swaraj).

Srijut Syam Sundar Chakravarti before his deportation last December, was known outside Bengal, mainly through his connection with the "BANDE MATARAM" newspaper. He was present at the congress that failed at Surat, where his simplicity of life and habits, his steadfast devotion to the Nationalist cause, his uncompromising regard for the ideals and principles that stand for Nationalism in India, won him the admiration and love of the large body of Nationalists gathered from all parts of the country. Henceforth he came to be regarded as one of the leaders of the Movement on the Bengal side.

In his own province, however, Syam Sundar has been long known as a very capable Bengali journalist and writer. His paper the "PRATIBHASI" occupied the foremost place among Bengalee weeklies, in regard to its thoughtfulness, sobriety, and superior literary character. But popular and sensational journalism has, to a very large extent, destroyed the chances of success of high-class literary journals in Bengal, as elsewhere; and the "PRATIBHASI" succumbed, after a few years, to the severe financial strain under which it lived and laboured almost all through its life. When the "SANDHYA" was started by the late Brahma Bandhab Upadhyaya, Syam Sundar joined its staff, and his simple and racy style contributed very largely to the unique success which that paper attained at one part of its life. When the "BANDU MATARAN" was organised as a Joint Stock concern, about the end of 1906, Syam Sundar left "the SANDHYA" and joined its staff, and he was, to a very large extent, the very life and soul of that paper, until it was suppressed by the Government last November. A few weeks later, Syam Sundar was himself arrested and deported, under Regulation III. of 1818, without any public indictment or trial.

Syam Sundar belongs to a generation that came very largely under the influence of the Hindu Revival of the closing quarter of the last century. Unlike Aavini Kumar, Krishna Kumar, or Manoranjan,—Syam Sundar had never broken away from the ancient thoughts and traditions of his people, and, consequently while Aavini Kumar and Manoranjan represent what may be called the return movement in Bengalee thought and life of our time, Syam Sundar represents the type of staunch nationalism that comes through the natural and instinctive conservatism of every people. He has, of course, come under the rationalistic influences of his age, and has had, therefore, to work out some sort of a synthesis between old ideas and institutions on the one side, and the new thoughts, aspirations, and conditions on the other. But it did not come through any open antithesis or protest but grew naturally, and almost unconsciously, through the normal evolution of his intellectual and social environments.

No revival can really revive the past, just as it was in the past. It has to adjust the past to the living conditions of the present. A successful revival must, therefore, offer a new synthesis, a new synthesis. It is in such a sense that the Hindu Revival in India of the last century has had its main success. It must be admitted that the movement of this Revival has more or less unconsciously taken note of the influence of the Brahmo Samaj and the reform movements of our day.

As it is called, it is not really the revival of the fathers; it is a new phase, a new interpretation, and a new synthesis of old and traditional ideals, in the light of present needs and conditions. In the words of Emerson, as Emerson says, the Hindu Revival has moved backward to pick out the reflected truth that had been previously lost sight of and left on the way. The movements of protest, inaugurated under Western influences, had left many a precious truth behind. They had ever emphasised the unreason and injustice of ancient thoughts and institutions, and had, therefore, overlooked the soul of truth and the counterpoise of good that lie mixed up everywhere with falsehoods and evils. Those movements were also more or less forced from the outside, through the influence of imported ideas and ideals, and these latter brought in their train their own necessary counterpoise of falsehoods and evils, which, being foreign to the thought and life of the people, met with no natural antidote that society almost unconsciously and automatically always and everywhere provides against the necessary evils of its own native life and thought. All these combined to contribute to the strength of the reaction which passed over the country during the closing decades of the last century. It obstructed the advance of the aggressive religious and social reform movements visibly; but all the same contributed to the general progress of thought and life, almost in every direction. The present Nationalist Movement in India is very largely indebted to this Reaction or Revival for a good deal both of its inner strength and its outer influence.

Syam Sundar is essentially a child of this Reaction. He has always clung to the spirit and traditions of his race with a tender tenacity, that, while recognising their frailties, yet shrank from ruthlessly rooting them up lest the sacred organism itself should be wounded and injured in the operation. But he has also been sensitive to liberal influences, and has been sincerely respectful towards the leaders of the Brahmo Samaj and other reform movements; but being essentially a man of sentiment, he has never permitted his intellectual ideas and appreciations to weaken the hold of his affection upon his own country and people. His patriotism has always controlled his reason and prevented him from making any violent protest in the name of Reason against the thoughts, beliefs, traditions and institutions of his race.

Patriotism is really of two kinds, abstract and concrete. The social and religious reformer loves his country and his people as ardently and devotedly as any other person; but his patriotism is of the abstract kind. He loves only the good, the beautiful, and the true, in his own country. He has no toleration for the bad, the ugly, and the false. He is more or less of an iconoclast. He is cast in the mould of the prophet—rigid, uncompromising, faithful to whatever is true and good, relentless in his war against whatever, in his eyes, is false and evil. His country is to him more of an ideal than a reality. Krishna Kumar's patriotism is essentially of this type, among us. But there is another class of patriotism also. It may be best characterised as concrete. It is not the love of an abstraction called country or nation. It loves its people in the concrete, just as they are, a mixture of both reason and unreason, of both good and bad. It loves its nation with a pure love, which sees the whole, seizes the totality, and in that totality, finds an explanation for both its reason and unreason, its good and evil, and seeing both the light and the shade together, it is able to realise the proper perspective of both. It is not blind to the faults and errors, the evils and the weaknesses of its own nation, but only sees their natural explanations which others fail to see, and thus recognising the spirit of truth and goodness and the source of strength that lie hidden underneath them, he seeks to remove and remedy them from within, by working up the latent truth and goodness and strength; and is, in the meantime, lovingly tolerant of them. This is the character of what may be called concrete patriotism. Syam Sundar's patriotism is of this kind, and consequently, it is characterised by an intense conservatism, which is the soul of natural, as distinguished from philosophic, nationalism everywhere.

But Syam Sundar is by no means a rigid and hide-bound conservative. He is always prepared to move with the times, and in practical life, he has, like almost every Nationalist, given up many of the obsolete institutions and usages of his country and his caste. Born of very high-class Brahmin parents—his father was a well-known Adhyapaka or professor of Brahminical lore—he observes all the formalism of Brahminical life, to the extent that these are demanded by the public opinion of his caste. But as far as that public opinion has commenced to become tolerant of heterodox habits and thoughts, Syam Sundar does not refuse to follow them. In fact, he does not even shrink from initiating these reforms, provided they do not create any vital disruption in social life. He is, therefore, as much at home with the orthodox Brahmin-Pundit as with the heterodox England-turned civilian or Barrister. It is neither in eating nor drinking (though he is a teetotaler) that his Brahminism ever seeks to assert itself. Neither is it in his pride of birth that it comes out. He mixes freely with men of all castes, and in private life treats the Pariah with almost the same respect as he would render to a Brahmin, provided, of course, the former occupies in education and character the same position as the latter. But all the inherent pride of race in the man comes out the moment mere wealth seeks to assert itself over culture or character. In one sense, therefore, Syam Sundar's spirit is perhaps the most democratic among the leading Nationalist workers in Bengal. But it is the democracy of the Brahmin, the claims of the intellect and the real man to equality, despite all differences in worldly position due to wealth or rank. It is the proud protest of the old spirit of intellectual and spiritual aristocracy of Hinduism, against the British-created aristocracy of land and lucre. Along with this pride of intellect and culture, Syam Sundar has also inherited from his Brahmin ancestors a tender humanity, which is almost feminine in its care for the weak and the bereaved. Extremely sensitive to the least suspicion of slight or neglect, Syam Sundar is also among the most selfless of our public men. Very poor himself, he has never refused to part with his last penny, to any one, friend or acquaintance, who stood in greater or even equal need of it. Poverty makes misanthropes in Europe, his own poverty has made something of a philanthropist of this chip of an old and aristocratic Brahmin block. How much of it is due to his inheritance in the supremely spiritual civilisation of his nation, and how much to his own personal temperament, it is difficult to say. But whatever may be their origin and cause, all who have come into intimate contact with Syam Sundar, have found his impulses to be almost uniformly noble, and his ideas lofty.

Meanwhile he had brought me out of solitude and placed me among those who had been accused along with me. You have spoken much today of my self sacrifice and devotion to my country. I have heard that kind of speech ever since I came out of jail, but I hear it with embarrassment, with something of pain. For I knew my weakness. I am pray to my own faults and backslidings. I was not blind to them before and when they all rose up against me in seclusion, I felt them utterly. I knew then that I the man was a mass of weakness, a faulty and imperfect instrument, strong only when a higher strength entered into one. Then I found myself among these young men and in many of them I discovered a mighty courage, a power of selfeffacement in comparison with which I was simply nothing. I saw one or two who were not only superior to me in force and character,—very many were that,—but in the promise of that intellectual ability on which I prided myself. He said to me. "This is the young generation, the new and mighty nation that is arising at my command. They are greater than yourself. What have you to fear. If you stood aside or slept, the work would still be done. If you were cast aside tomorrow here are the young men who will take up your work and do it more mightily than you have ever done. You have only got some strength from me to speak a word to this nation which will help to rise it". This was the next thing He told me.

Then a thing happened suddenly and in a moment I was hurried away to the seclusion of a solitary cell. What happened to me during that period I am not impelled to say, but only this that day after day, He showed me His wonders and made me realise the utter truth of the Hindu religion. I had had many doubts before. I was brought up in England amongst foreign ideas and an atmosphere entirely foreign. Many things in Hinduism I had once been inclined to believe that it was all imaginations; that there was much of dream in it, much that was delusion and mayy. But now day after day I realised in the mind, I realised in the heart, I realised in the body the truths of the Hindu religion. They became living experiences to me, and things were opened to me which no material science could explain. When I first approached Him, it was not entirely in the spirit of the Bhakti, it was not entirely in the spirit of Gnana. I came to Him long ago in Baroda some years before the Swadeshi began and I was drawn into the public field.

When I approached God at that time, I hardly had a living faith in Him. The agnostic was in me, the atheist was in me, the sceptic was in me and I was not absolutely sure that there was a God at all. I did not feel His presence. Yet something drew me to the truth of the Vedas, the truth of the Gita, the truth of the Hindu religion. I felt there must be a mighty truth somewhere in this Yoga, a mighty truth in this religion based on the Vedas. So when I turned to the Yoga and resolved to practise it and find out if my idea was right, I did it in this spirit and with this prayer to Him, "If Thou art, then thou knowest my heart. Thou knowest that I do not ask for Mukti, I do not ask for anything which others ask for. I ask only for strength to uplift this nation, I ask only to be allowed to live and work for this people whom I love and to whom I pray that I may devote my life." I strove long for the realisation of Yoga and at last to some extent I had it, but in what I most desired, I was not satisfied. Then in the seclusion of the Jail, of the solitary cell I asked for it again. I said "Give me thy adesh, I do not know what work to do or how to do it. Give me a message." In the communion of Yoga two messages came. The first message said, "I have given you a work and it is to help to uplift this nation. Before long the time will come when you will have to go out of jail; for it is not my will that this time either you should be convicted or that you should pass the time as others have to do, in suffering for their country, I have called you to work, and that is the adesh for which you have asked. I give you the adesh to go forth and do My work." The second message came and it said, "Something has been shown to you in this year of seclusion, something about which you had your doubts and it is the truth of the Hindu religion. It is this religion that I am raising up before the world, it is this that I have perfected and developed through the risis, saints and avatars, and now it is going forth to do my work among the nations I am raising up this nation to send forth My word. This is the Sanatana Dharma, this is the eternal religion which you did not really know before, but which I have now revealed to you. The agnostic and the sceptic in you have been answered, for I have given you proofs within and without you, physical and subjective, which have satisfied you. When you go forth, speak to your nation always this word that it is for the "Sanatana Dharma" that they arise, it is for the world and not for themselves that they arise. I am giving them freedom for the service of the world. when therefore it is said that India shall rise, it is the "Sanatana Dharma" that shall rise. When it is said that India shall be great, it is the "Sanatana Dharma" that shall be great. When it is said that the India shall expand and extend herself, it is the "Sanatana Dharma" that shall expand and extend itself over the world. It is for the dharma and by the dharma that India exists. To magnify the religion means to magnify the country. I have shown you that I am everywhere and in all men and in all things, that I am in this movement and I am not only working in those who are striving for the country but I am working also in those who oppose them and stand in their path. I am working in every body and whatever men may think or do they can do nothing but help on my purpose. They also are doing my work; they are not my enemies but my instruments. In all your actions you are moving forward without knowing which way you move. You mean to do one thing and you do another. You aim at a result and your efforts subserve a that is different or contrary. It is Shakti that has gone forth and entered into the people. Long ago I have been preparing this uprising and now the time has come and it is I who will lead it to its fulfilment."

This then is what I have to say to you. The name of your society is "society for the protection of religion." Well, the protection of the religion, the protection and upraising before the world of the Hindu religion, that is the work before us. But what is the Hindu religion? What is this religion which we call Sanatana eternal? It is the Hindu religion only because the Hindu nation has kept it, because in this Peninsula it grew up in the seclusion of the Sea and the Himalayas, because in this sacred and ancient land it was given as a charge to the Aryan race to preserve through the ages. But it is not circumscribed by the confines of a single country, it does not belong peculiarly and for ever to a bounded part of the world. That which we call the Hindu religion is really the eternal religion, because it is the universal religion which embraces all others. If a religion is not universal, it cannot be eternal. A narrow religion, a sectarian religion, an exclusive religion can live only for a limited time and a limited purpose. This is the one religion that can triumph over materialism by including and anticipating the discoveries of science and the speculations of philosophy. It is the one religion which impresses on mankind the closeness of God to us and embraces in its compass all the possible means by which man can approach God. It is the one religion which insists every moment on the truth which all religions acknowledge that He is in all men and all things and that in Him we move and have our being. It is the one religion which enables us not only to understand and believe this truth but to realise it with every part of our being. It is the one religion which shows the world what the world is, that it is the lila of Vasudeva. It is the one religion which shows us how we can best play our part in that lila, its subtlest law and its noblest rules. It is the one religion which does not separate life in any smallest details from religion, which knows what immortality is and has utterly removed from us the reality of death.

This is the word that has been put into my mouth to speak to you to-day. What I intended to speak, has been put away from me, and beyond what is given to me I have nothing to say. It is only the word that is put into me that I can speak to you. That word is now finished. I spoke once before with this force in me and I said then that this movement is not a political movement and that nationalism is not politics but a religion, a creed, a faith I say it again to-day, but I put it in another way. I say no longer that nationalism is a creed, a religion, faith; I say that it is the "Sanatana Dharma" which for us is nationalism. This Hindu nation was born with the "Sanatana Dharma" with it it moves and with it it grows. When the "Sanatana Dharma" declines, then the nation declines, and if the "Sanatana Dharma" were capable of perishing, with the "Sanatana Dharma" it would perish. The "Sanatana Dharma" that is nationalism. This is the message that I have to speak to you.

NEWS.

THE KHULNA CONFERENCE.—

At the District Conference, held on Saturday and Sunday last, nineteen resolutions were adopted, including partition, swadeshi, boycott, the reform scheme, the deportations, swaraj, unity among the various sects, self-protection, sanitation, marriage dowries, and arbitration Courts. The Conference protested against the improper treatment of under-trial prisoners and deportees, vexatious house searches, prohibition of sanities and national education. Delegates came from all parts of the district representing the various sects. Nearly 3000 people attended daily.

THE BARISAL CONFERENCE.—

The Exhibition of the Jhalakati National School was opened by Srijut Aurobindo Ghose. The art productions attracted general admiration. Mr. Ghose delivered an impressive speech emphasizing the necessity of national education for fostering the national spirit and moulding the national character. He deplored Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt's deportation, eulogising his eminent virtues. The District Conference met later, some 3,000 persons being present. After the address of the Chairman of the Reception Committee, Srijut Rajendra Lal Pal Chowdhury, the President, Srijut Hara Nath Ghose delivered his address. Next Srijut Aurobindo Ghose addressed the meeting. An enlarged photo of Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt was prominently placed on the "dais" and garlanded. The audience stood up in reverence when Aswini Babu's name was mentioned by the President. The first Resolution expressed sorrow and regret at the deportation of the nine Bengali gentlemen and condemned Regulation III of 1919. After it was carried resolutions were adopted on swadeshi, boycott, national education, female primary education, prevention of intemperance, physical and moral culture, sanitation, arbitration courts, partition of Bengal. The sixth resolution expressed sorrow at the separate representation of Hindus and Mahomedans and the denial of an Executive Council to East Bengal. The next resolution condemned prohibition of lawful meetings and associations. Other resolutions touched on local topics.

THE FIND OF EXPLOSIVES.—

The Maratha Brahmin Hari Vishnu Athavle, who was arrested at Kalyan on being found in possession of a trunk full of explosives was handed over to the Bombay Criminal Investigation Department by the G. I. P. Railway Police. Among the things there was found a book containing various names and addresses and it is stated that the names included those of certain persons recently implicated in bomb throwing cases as also of a number of swadeshi firms in Bombay. On chemical examination the police discovered in Athavle's trunk a quantity of picric acid, phenyle and other chemicals generally used in the manufacture of explosives. There were a number of other things also. It is believed the trunk was making a hundred of most dangerous explosives imaginable. Both the railway and the detective police do not wish to make any statement whatsoever about the case, but it has been ascertained that the local Criminal Investigation Department conducted a few searches in the places Athavle pointed out, although nothing incriminating was found there. It is also stated that they arrested a man in a year whose name was given by Athavle as an accomplice but nothing having been found against the man he was set free. Later when the police wanted the man he had disappeared. As far as can be ascertained it appears that the police enquiry in Bombay has proved fruitless. Athavle will be tried at Thana.

THE PRESENT SITUATION.—

At the day on the 29th June—A lecture on "The Present Situation" was delivered by Mr. Purthar, a pleader of Nasik. The lecturer in the course of a lengthy harangue, observed that among many men who had spoken on the subject, was Mr. Tilak, who being out of the day, was missed by them. He was a source of great inspiration to those of his party. The speaker said that he extremely regretted, not unmixed with indignation, that lately the movement started for the purpose of holding a meeting for congratulating Mr. Aurobindo Ghosh, who was acquitted of an alleged criminal offence, should have been prohibited by the police. He however took this opportunity of expressing on behalf of the public of Bombay his great satisfaction at his acquittal. There were two distinct ideals, placed before the Indians, one was self-Government on Colonial lines, advocated by Mr. Gokhale, and the other was absolute autonomy or independence, advocated by Messrs. Ghose and Pal. The latter was the only genuine ideal in the speaker's opinion, which the Indians should cherish as their own. The speaker raised the services to the country of Messrs. Ghose, Pal and Tilak and told the audience to cherish the ideal of autonomy, secretly or publicly, irrespective of the Government policy of conciliation of one section and of repression of the other. The Chairman said that Lord Morley had described the ideal of Self-Government as something like crying for the moon. But, all the same, in his opinion, the self-Government wanted in India was on the lines of "no taxation without representation" on the principle of self-help, to continue in Swadeshiism and to raise themselves spiritually and morally. The meeting dispersed with cries of "Bande Mataram."

Mr. GOKHALE and Nationalism:—At Poona on the 20th June. Mr. Dravid, Member of the Servants of India Society, and Editor, "Gnan Prakash," delivered a lecture under the auspices of the Deccan Sabha on "Nationalism or Liberalism." After quoting from the manifesto of the Deccan Sabha, drawn up by the late Mr. Justice Ranade, he said, "Liberalism implied freedom from race and creed prejudices and a keen sense of justice between man and man. Nationalism was instinctive and was confined to cases where a people had external relations. In these cases political entities were not inspired by the sense of justice." The lecturer's main point was to show that Nationalism, as it was being used and interpreted now in India, would stifle the spirit of Liberalism.

which alone could supply the basis for nation building, which process had only just begun. The Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale and the Hon'ble J. Dikshit who took part in the debate ensued, criticized Mr. Dravid's view of the matter, Mr. Gokhale maintaining that there was an aspect of Nationalism which militated against Liberalism, but it was only an aspect. The latent view of Nationalism and Liberalism was one. Liberalism in one sense was higher than Nationalism but without a growing sense of common nationality they were likely to lose themselves in inefficient humanitarianism. "If Mr. Dravid," he said, "means only to say that in India at the present time Liberalism was more needed for the very purpose of building up a nation, he would agree to the proposition; but then so defined an opposition between Nationalism and Liberalism, vanishes, and we should be deceived by the narrow meaning given to the word 'Nationalism' by some misguided people." In the course of his remarks Mr. Gokhale asked how many Englishmen were, after all, there in the country in the Civil Service, and in the Army? All told not more than eighty thousand. A mere handful of police in the vast Indian continent preserve order. The difficulty in the matter of Indian nation building came from the Indians themselves in the main. Professor Linacre of Fergusson College supported Mr. Dravid in the distinction sought to be drawn between the two sets of forces. The lecture and debate were in Marathi.

OPINION AND COMMENTS.

The highest synthesis.

In the Bengalee's issue of the 29th June there is a very interesting article on Nationalism and Expediency, which seems to us to call for some comment. The object of the article is to modify or water the strong wine of Nationalism by a dash of expediency. Nationalism is a faith, the writer admits; he even goes much further than we are prepared to go and claims for Nationalism that it is the highest of all syntheses. This is a conclusion we are not prepared to accept; it is, we know, the highest which European thought has arrived at so far as that thought has expressed itself in the actual life and ideals of the average European. In Positivism Europe has attempted to arrive at a higher synthesis, the synthesis of humanity; and Socialism and philosophical Anarchism, the Anarchism of Tolstoi and Spencer, have even envisaged the application of the higher intellectual synthesis to life. In India we do not recognize the nation as the highest synthesis to which we can rise. There is a higher synthesis, humanity; beyond that there is a still higher synthesis, this living, suffering, aspiring world of creatures, the synthesis of Buddhism; there is a highest of all, the synthesis of God, and that is the Hindu synthesis, the synthesis of Vedanta. With us to-day Nationalism is our immediate practical faith and gospel not because it is the highest possible synthesis, but because it must be realised in life if we are to have the chance of realising the others. We must live as a nation before we can live in humanity. It is for this reason that Nationalist thinkers have always urged the necessity of realising our separateness from other nations and living to ourselves for the present, not in order to shut out humanity, but that we may get that individual strength, unity and wholeness which will help us to live as a nation for humanity. A man must be strong and free in himself before he can live usefully for others, so must a nation. But that does not justify us in forgetting the ultimate aim of evolution. God in the nation becomes the realisation of the first moment to us because the nation is the chosen means or condition through which we rise to the higher synthesis, God in humanity, God in all creatures, God in Himself and ourself.

Faith and analysis.

Because Nationalism is the highest synthesis, it is more than a mere faith, says the Bengalee, it embodies an analysis, however unconscious or even inadequate, of the actual forces and conditions of life. We do not quite understand our contemporary's philosophy. An unconscious analysis is a contradiction in terms. There may be a vague and illexpressed weighing of things in the rough, but that is not analysis. Analysis is in its nature a deliberate intellectual process; the other is merely a perception of things separately or together but without analysis. And analysis is not inconsistent with faith, but must accompany it unless the faith is merely superstition. Every faith is to a certain extent rational, it has its own analysis and synthesis by which it seeks to establish itself intellectually; so has Nationalism. What the Bengalee means is apparently that our faith ought not to exceed our observation; in other words, we ought to calculate the forces for and against us and if the favourable forces are weak and the unfavourable strong, we ought to move with caution and hesitation. Now that is a very different question which has nothing to do with the philosophical aspect of Nationalism but with the policy of the moment. Our position is that Nationalism is our faith, our Dharma, and its realisation the duty which lies before the country at the present moment. If so, it is a thing which must be done and from which we cannot turn merely because the forces are against us. If we rely on an analysis of forces, what is it we arrive at? It was only yesterday that there was a series of articles in the Bengalee which sought to establish the proposition that the Hindus on whom the burden of the movement has fallen are a doomed and perishing race. The writer arrived at that conclusion by patient and exhaustive analysis. What else does analysis show us? It shows us one of the most powerful Governments in the world determined not to part with its absolute control and aided for the present by a large part of one of the chief communities in India. On the other side a people unequipped, unorganized, without means or resources, divided within itself, a considerable portion of it inert, and even in the educated class a part of it unsympathetic, afraid, insisting on caution and prudence. Shall we then turn from our work? Shall we deny God? Rationality demands that we should. And if we do not, it is simply because it would be to deny God, because we have 'mere' faith, because we believe that God is within us, a spiritual force strong enough to overcome all physical obstacles, weaknesses, disabilities, that God is in the movement, that He is its leader and guides it, that we belong to the world and the future and are not a spent and dying force. This faith we hold because we understand the processes by which He works and can therefore see good in evil, light in the darkness, a preparation for victory in defeat, a new life in the apparent process of disintegration.

Mature Deliberation.

That the movement is from God has been apparent in its history. Our contemporary does not believe that God created and leads the movement, he thinks that Sriji Surendra Nath Banerji created it and leads it. Only so can we explain the extraordinary statement, "every step that has been taken in construction has been preceded by mature deliberation". Is this so? Was the Swadeshi movement preceded by mature deliberation? Everybody knows that it was scouted by our leaders and, if it had been again proposed to them a month before it suddenly seized the country, would still have been scouted. It came as a flood comes and swept away everybody in its mighty current. Was the Boycott preceded by mature deliberation? Everybody knows how it came, advocated by obscure mofussil towns, propagated by a Calcutta vernacular newspaper, forced on leaders who shrank from it with misgivings, accepted it with tremours and even then would only have used it for a short time as a means of pressure to get the Partition reversed. Everybody knows how it spread over Bengal with the impetuosity of a cyclone. Was the National Education movement preceded by mature deliberation? It came suddenly, it came unexpectedly, unwelcome to many and still damned with a halfhearted support by the leaders of the country. This is what we mean by saying that God is in the movement and leads it. It is a greater than human force, incalculable, sudden and impetuous, which has swept over the country shattering and recreating, transforming cowards into heroes, lovers of ease into martyrs, self-seekers into self-sacrificers, changing in a few years the whole outlook, temper and character of a nation.

The Importance of the Individual.

It is not surprising that with these ideas the Bengalee should deprecate the cry for continued courage and self-sacrifice which has been made by Sriji Aurobindo Ghose in his speech at Jhalakati, for to that speech the article is a controversial answer. The cry for expediency resolves itself into an argument for individual prudence on the part of the leaders. "It seems to us to be a fatal idea that for the progress of the nation individuals are not necessary or that particular individuals are not more necessary than other individuals." And the writer asks whether an organ is justified in cutting itself off for the sake of the organism, and immediately answers his own question partially by saying, yes, when the interests of the organism require it. The metaphor is a false one; for the individual is not an organ, he is simply an atom, and atoms not only can be replaced but are daily replaced, and the replacement is necessary for the continued life of the organism. In times of stress or revolution the replacement is more rapid, that is all. Whatever the importance of particular individuals,—and the importance of men like S. J. Aswini Kumar Dutta or S. J. Krishna Kumar Mitra is not denied by any man in his senses and was not denied but dwelt upon by the speaker at Jhalakati,—they are not necessary, in the sense that God does not depend upon them for the execution of His purposes. Our contemporary does not expressly deny God's existence or His omnipotence or His providence, and if he accepts them, he is debarred from insisting that God cannot save India without S. J. Surendra Nath Banerji or S. J. Aswini Kumar Dutta, that he is unable to remove them and find other instruments or that their deportation or disappearance will defer the fulfilment of His purposes to future centuries.

The Fatalism of Action.

Our contemporary does however seem to doubt these qualities in the Ruler of all. He holds it to be a fatal doctrine "that we are none of us necessary, that everything that is happening or can happen is for the best, that God is seeking His fulfilment in inscrutable ways, that He will Himself lead the country when our prominent men are removed from the arena." This he says, is fatalism, and by flinging the word fatalism at Sriji Aurobindo, he thinks he has damned his position. The word fatalism means usually a resigned passivity, and certainly any leader who preached such a gospel would be injuring the country. That would be indeed a fatal doctrine. But our contemporary admits that it is a fatalism of action and not of inaction he is censuring, he blames the speaker for advocating too much action and not too little. All that the "fatalism" censured means is a firm faith in the love and wisdom of God and a belief based on past experience that as it is His purpose to raise up India, therefore everything that happens or can happen just now will tend to the fulfilment of His purpose. In other words, there is now an upward tendency in the nation with an immense force behind it and, in such conditions, it is part of human experience that the force makes use of every event to assist the progress of the tendency until its contribution to human development is fulfilled. That is the idea of Kala or the Zeitgeist working, and, put religiously, it means that God being Supreme Wisdom uses everything for His supreme purposes and out of evil cometh good. This is true of our private life as every man of spiritual insight can testify; he can name and estimate the particular good which has come out of every apparent evil in his life. The same truth applies to the life of the nation.

God's ways.

When it is said that God's ways are inscrutable, it is simply meant that man's reason, on which the Bengalee lays so much stress, is not always sufficient to estimate at the time the object He has in a particular dispensation of calamity or defeat. It seems to be nothing but calamity and defeat and it is only afterwards that the light of reason looking backwards is able by the illumination of subsequent events to understand His doings. Therefore we must have faith and an invincible faith or else the calamities will be too great for our courage and endurance. Is this a false doctrine or a fatal doctrine? Will the country be injured by it or helped by it? Sriji Aurobindo never said that God would step in to fill the place of Sriji Aswini Dutta or others removed from the arena. His position was that God has been driving on the movement from the beginning and was always the leader when they were with us and remains the leader when they are taken from us.

Adequate Value.

The Bengalee insists however that individual life is quite as sacred for its own purposes as national life for its higher purposes, that the nation must get adequate value for each sacrifice that the individuals make, and that great men must protect themselves from danger because their removal at a critical moment may mean incalculable injury. We deny that individual life is as sacred as national life; the smaller can not be as sacred as the greater, self cannot be as sacred as others.

Expediency and Nationalism.

Injury" is likely to be done by teaching of this kind at this juncture than by the removal of any great man, however prominent and inspiring his greatness.

The whole burden of our human progress has been an attempt to escape from the bondage to the body and the vital impulses. According to the scientific theory the human being began as the animal, developed through the savage and consummated in the modern civilized man. The Indian theory is different. God created the world by developing the many out of the One and the material out of the spiritual. From the beginning the objects which compose the physical world were arranged by Him in their causes, developed under the law of their being in the subtle or psychical world and then manifested in the gross or material world. From karana to sukshma, from sukshma to sthula, and back again, that is the formula. Once manifested in matter the world proceeds by laws which do not change, from age to age, by a regular succession, until it is all withdrawn back again into the source from which it came. The material goes back into the psychical and the psychical is involved in its cause or seed. It is again put out when the period of expansion recurs and runs its course on similar lines but with different details till the period of contraction is due. Hinduism regards the world as a recurrent series of phenomena of which the terms vary but the general formula abides the same. The theory is only acceptable if we recognize the truth of the conception formulated in the Vishnu Purana of the world as vijnana-vijrimbhitan, developments of ideas in the Universal Intelligence which lies at the root of all material phenomena and by its indwelling force shapes the growth of the tree and the evolution of the clod as well as the development of living creatures and the progress of mankind. Whichever theory we take, the laws of the material world are not affected. From aeon to aeon, from kalpa to kalpa Narayan manifests himself in an ever-evolving humanity which grows in experience by a series of expansions and contractions towards its destined self-realisation in God. That evolution is not denied by the Hindu theory of vayas. Each aeon in the Hindu system has its own line of material and spiritual

The animal is distinguished from man by its enslavement to the body and the vital impulses. Ashanaya mrityu, Hunger who is Death, evolved the material world from of old, and it is the physical hunger and desire and the vital sensations and primary emotions connected with the Prana that seek to feed upon the world in the beast and in the savage man who approximates to the condition of the beast. Out of this animal state according to European Science, man rises working out the tiger and the ape by intellectual and moral development in the social condition. If the beast has to be worked out, it is obvious that the body and the prana must be conquered, and as that conquest is more or less complete, the man is more or less evolved. The progress of mankind has been placed by many predominatingly in the development of the human intellect, and intellectual development is no doubt essential to self-conquest. The animal and the savage are bound by the body because the ideas of the animal or the ideas of the savage are mostly limited to those sensations and associations which are connected with the body. The development of intellect enables a man to find the deeper self within and partially replace what our philosophy calls the dhatmak buddhi, the sum of ideas and sensations which make us think of the body as ourself, by another set of ideas which reach beyond the body, and, existing for their own delight and substituting intellectual and moral satisfaction as the chief objects of life, master, if they can not entirely silence, the clamour of the lower sensual desires. That animal ignorance which is engrossed with the cards and the pleasures of the body and the vital impulses, emotions and sensations is tamasic, the result of the predominance of the third principle of nature which leads to ignorance and inertia. That is the state of the animal and the lower forms of humanity which are called in the Purana the first or ta va ti ce sa ti on. This animal state has the development of the intellect tends to dispel and it assumes therefore an all-important place in human evolution.

But it is not only through the intellect that man rises. If the clarified intellect is not supported by purified emotions, the intellect tends to be dominated once more by the body and to put itself at its service and the lordship of the body over the whole man becomes more dangerous than in the natural state because the innocence of the natural state is lost. The power of knowledge is placed at the disposal of the senses, sattva serves tanus, the god in us becomes the slave of the brute. The disservice which scientific Materialism is unintentionally doing the world is to encourage a return to this condition; the suddenly awakened masses of men, unaccustomed to deal intellectually with ideas, able to grasp the broad attractive innovations of free thought but unable to appreciate its delicate reservations, verge towards that reeling back into the beast, that relapse into barbarism which was the condition of the Roman Empire at a high stage of material civilisation and intellectual culture and which a distinguished British statesman declared the other day to be the condition to which all Europe approached. The development of the emotions is therefore the first condition of a sound human evolution. Unless the feelings tend away from the body and the love of others takes increasingly the place of the brute love of self, there can be no progress upward. The organisation of human society tends to develop the altruistic element in man which makes for life and battles with and conquers akarmaya mritu. It is therefore not the struggle for life, or at least not the struggle for our own life, but the struggle for the life of others which is the most important term in evolution,—for our children, for our family, for our class, for our community, for our race and nation, for humanity. An ever-enlarging self takes the place of the old narrow self which is confined to our individual mind and body, and it is this moral growth which society helps and organises.

So far there is little essential difference between our own ideas of human progress and those of the West except in this vital point that the West believes this evolution to be a development of matter and the satisfaction of the reason, the reflective and observing intellect, to be the highest term of our progress. Here it is that our religion parts company with Science. It declares the evolution to be a conquest of matter by the recovery of the deeper emotional and intellectual self which was involved in the body and overclouded by the desires of the prana. In the language of the Upanishads the manakkosha and the buddhikosha are more than the pranakkosha and annakkosha and it is to them that man rises in his evolution. Religion farther seeks a higher term for our evolution than the purified emotions or the clarified activity of the observing and reflecting intellect. The highest term of evolution is the spirit in which knowledge, love and action, the threefold dharma of humanity, find their fulfilment and end. This is the atman in the anandakosha, and it is by communion and identity of this individual self with the universal self which is God that man will become entirely pure, entirely strong, entirely wise and entirely blissful, and the evolution will be fulfilled. The conquest of the body and the vital self by the purification of the emotions and the clarification of the intellect was the principal work of the past. The purification has been done by morality and religion, the clarification by science and philosophy, art, literature and social and political life being the chief media in which these uplifting forces have worked. The conquest of the emotions and the intellect by the spirit is the work of the future. Yoga is the means by which that conquest becomes possible.

In Yoga the whole past progress of humanity, a progress which it holds on a very uncertain lease, is rapidly summed up, confirmed and made an inalienable possession. The body is conquered, not imperfectly as by the ordinary civilized man, but entirely. The vital part is purified and made the instrument of the higher emotional and intellectual self in its relations with the outer world. By ideas which go outward are replaced the ideas which move within, the baser qualities are worked out of the system and replaced by those which are higher, the lower emotions are crowded out by the nobler. Finally all ideas and emotions are stilled and by the perfect awakening of the intuitive reason which places mind in communion with spirit the whole man is ultimately placed at the service of the Infinite. All false self merges into the true Self. Man acquires likeness, union or identification with God. This is mukti, the state in which humanity thoroughly realises the freedom and immortality which are its eternal goal.

A TASK UNACCOMPLISHED.

There is no question so vital to the future of this nation as the spirit in which we are to set about the regeneration of our national life. Either India is rising again to fulfil the function for which her past national life and development seem to have prepared her, a leader of thought and faith, a defender of spiritual truth and experience destined to correct the conclusions of materialistic Science by the Higher Science of which she has the secret and in that power to influence the world's civilisation, or she is rising as a faithful pupil of Europe, a follower of methods and ideas borrowed from the West, a copyist of English politics and society. In the one case her aspiration must be great, her faith unshakeable, her efforts and sacrifices such as to command the admiration of the world; in the other no such greatness of soul is needed or possible;—a cautious, slow and gradual progress involving no extraordinary effort and no unusual sacrifices is sufficient for and end so small. In the one case her destiny is to be a great nation remoulding and leading the civilisation of the world, in the other it is to be a subordinate part of the British Empire sharing in the social life, the political privileges, the intellectual ideals and attainments of the Anglo-Celtic race. These are the two ideals before us, and an ideal is not mere breath, it is a thing compelling which determines the spirit of our action and often fixes the method. No policy can be successful which does not take into view the end to be attained and the amount and nature of the effort needed to effect it. The leader of industry who enters on a commercial enterprise, first looks at the magnitude of his field and intended output and equips himself with capital and plant accordingly, and even if he cannot commence at once on the scale of his ideal he holds it in view himself, puts it before the public in issuing his prospectus and estimating the capital necessary, and all the practical steps he takes are conceived in the light of his original aspiration and ordered towards its achievement. So it is with the political ventures of a nation. To place before himself a great object and then to shrink in the name of expediency from the expenditure and sacrifice called for in its pursuit is not prudence but ineptitude. If you will be prudent, be prudent from the beginning. Fix your object low and creep towards it, or if you fix your object in the skies, it will not do to crawl on the ground and because your eyes are sometimes lifted towards the ideal imagine you are progressing while you murmur to those behind, "Yes, yes, our ideal is in the skies because that is the place for ideals; but we are on the ground and the ground is our proper place of motion. Let us creep, let us creep." Such inconsistency will only dishearten the nation, unnerve its strength and confuse its intelligence. You must either bring down your ideal to the ground or find wings or aeroplane to lift you to the skies. There is no middle course.

We believe that this nation is one which has developed itself in the past on spiritual lines under the inspiration of a destiny which is now coming to fulfilment. The peculiar seclusion in which it was able to develop its individual temperament, knowledge and ideas;—the manner in which the streams of the world poured in upon and were absorbed by the calm ocean of Indian spiritual life, recalling the great image in the Gita,—even as the waters flow into the great tranquil and immeasurable ocean, and the ocean is not perturbed;—the persistence with which peculiar and original forms of society, religion and philosophical thought were protected from disintegration up till the destined moment;—the deferring of that disintegration until the whole world outside had arrived at the point when the great Indian ideal which these forms enshrined could embrace all that it yet needed for its perfect self-expression, and be itself embraced by an age starved by materialism and yearning for a higher knowledge;—the sudden return of India upon itself at a time when all that was peculiarly Indian seemed to wear upon it the irrevocable death-sentence passed on all things that in the human evolution are no longer needed;—the miraculous uprising and transformation of weakness into strength brought about by that return;—all this seems to us to be not fortuitous and accidental but inevitable and preordained in the decrees of an overruling Providence. The rationalist looks on such beliefs and aspirations as mysticism and jargon. When confronted with the truths of Hinduism, the experience of deep thinkers and the choice spirits of the race through thousands of years, he shouts "Mysticism, mysticism!" and thinks he has conquered. To him there is order, development, progress, evolution, enlightenment in the history of Europe, but the past of India is an unceasing mass of superstition and ignorance.

book of human life. These thousands of years of our thought and aspiration are a period of the least importance to us and the true history of our progress only begins with the advent of European education! The rest is a confused nightmare or a mere barren lapse of time preparing nothing and leading to nothing. This tone is still vocal in the organs of the now declining school of the nineteenth century some of which preserve their influence in the provinces where the balance in the struggle between the past and the future has not inclined decidedly in favour of the latter. In Bengal it is still represented by an undercurrent of the old weakness and the old want of faith which struggles occasionally to establish itself by a false appearance of philosophical weight and wisdom. It cannot really believe that this is a movement with a divine force within and a mighty future before it. The only force it sees is the resentment against the Partition which in its view is enough to explain everything that has happened, the only future it envisages is reform and the reversal of the Partition. Recently, however, the gospel of Nationalism has made so much way that the organs of this school in Bengal have accepted many of its conclusions and their writings are coloured by its leading ideas. But the fundamental idea of the movement as a divine manifestation purposing to raise up the nation not only for its own fulfilment in India but for the work and service of the world and therefore sure of its fulfilment, therefore independent of individuals and superior to vicissitudes and difficulties, is one which they cannot yet grasp. It is a sentiment which has been growing upon us as the movement progressed, but it has not yet been sufficiently put forward by the organs of Nationalism itself, partly because the old idea of separating religion from politics lingered, partly because the human aspects of the Nationalist faith had to be established before we could rise to the divine. But that divine aspect has to be established if we are to have the faith and greatness of soul which can alone help us in the tremendous developments the signs of the time portend. There is plenty of weakness still lingering in the land and we cannot allow it to take shelter under the cry of expediency and rationality and seek to kill the faith and force that has been born in the hearts of the young. The Karma yugin has taken its stand on the rock of religion and its first object will be to combat these reactionary tendencies and lead the nation forward into the fuller light for which the Bande Mataram and other organs of the new faith only prepared. The gospel of Nationalism has not yet been fully preached; its most inspiring tenets have yet to be established not only by the eloquence of the orator and inspiration of the prophet but by the arguments of the legislator, the appeal to experience of the statesman and the harmonising generalisations of the scientist.

MR. MACKARNES' BILL.

We find in India to hand by mail last week the full text of Mr. Mackarnes' speech in introducing the Bill by which he proposes to amend the Regulation of 1818 and safeguard the liberties of the subject in India. We are by no means enamoured of the step which Mr. Mackarnes has taken. We could have understood a proposal to abolish the regulation entirely and disclaim the necessity or permissibility of coercion in India. This would be a sound Liberal position to take, but it would not have the slightest chance of success in England and would be no more than an emphatic form of protest not expected or intended to go farther. British Liberalism is and has always been self-regarding, liberal at home, hankering after benevolent despotism and its inevitable consummation in dependencies. To ask Liberal England to give up the use of coercion in emergencies would be to ask it to contradict a deep-rooted instinct. We could have understood, again, a Bill which while leaving the Government powers of an extraordinary nature to deport the subject, under careful safeguards, in unusual and well-defined circumstances and for no more than a fixed period, would yet leave the aggrieved subject an opportunity after his release of vindicating his character and, if it appeared that he had been deported unwarrantably and without due inquiry or in spite of complete innocence, of obtaining fitting compensation. Such an act would meet both the considerations of State and the considerations of justice. It would leave the Government ample power in emergencies but would take from it the freedom to deport out of caprice, panic or unscrupulous reactionism. Deportation would then be a rare act of State necessity, not an autocratic lettre-de-cachet used to bolster up injustice or crush all opposition to the continuance of autocratic absolutism. Mr. Mackarness' Bill seems to us to leave the essence of deportation just where it was before. The changes made are purely palliative and palliative not of the unjust, irritating and odious character of the measure but of the apparent monstrosity of deporting a man without even letting him or his friends or the world know what charge lay against him or whether any charge lay against him. It is this which gives an ultra-Russian character to the Regulation and makes the Liberal conscience queasy. The proposed changes are a salve to that conscience, not a benefit to the victim of deportation. It makes his position, if anything, worse. It is bad to be punished without any charge, it is worse to be punished on a charge which you are detained to all time from disproving.

There are three changes which the Bill contemplates. Instead of being able to confine a man until further orders the Viceroy has to renew his sanction every three months, a change which may have some deterrent effect on a Viceroy with a Liberal conscience but to others will mean merely a quarterly expenditure of a drop of ink and a few strokes of the pen. Another and more important change is the provision that, to qualify for deportation, "a British subject must be reasonably suspected of having been guilty of treasonable practices or of a crime punishable by law, being an act of violence or intimidation and tending to interfere with or disturb the maintenance of law and order." That, thinks Mr. Mackarness "insures in the first place that a man must have been guilty of some definite offence. At any rate it is intended to provide for that." Unfortunately the intention is all, there is no real provision for carrying it out, except the clause that the warrant shall contain a definite statement of the character of the crime. How will this clause help the alleged intention of the Bill? It is only the character of the crime that has to be defined and, if the authorities relying on a Marrue Haq or a Lakhal Laha frame a charge against Srijut Surendranath Benerji of waging war or abetting or conspiring to wage war or financing unlawful assemblies and incontinently detain him, would the Liberal conscience be satisfied? Or would it be possible for the moderate Leader to meet this charge, and defend its character? It is evident that to carry out the "intention" of the Bill it would be necessary to name the specific act or acts which constitute the offence and the time and circumstances of commission, for it is only a precise accusation that can be met. Even if the charge be precise in its terms, Mr. Mackarness' Bill provides no redress to the deportee. All that he can do is to submit a "representation" to the officials who have deported him. Those who know the ways of the bureaucrat can tell beforehand the inevitable answer to such representations, "The Government have considered your representation and see no cause to alter the conclusions they had arrived at upon sufficient and reliable information." So the deportation will stand, the charge will stand and the last condition of the deportee will be worse than his first. The only advantage the Bill will secure is the greater opportunities for effective heckling in the House of Commons if facts can be secured which throw doubt on the charge; but the Government has always the answer that its evidence is reliable and conclusive but for reasons of State policy it is not advisable to disclose either its nature or its sources, and the relics of the Liberal conscience will be satisfied. As things stand the deportations have made even some Imperialistic consciences uneasy and that advantage will be lost under the new Bill.

Mr. Mackarness has admitted that the regulations are absolutely hateful and he would prefer to propose their entire abolition if such a proposal had any chance of acceptance by a British House of Commons. His amendments will not make them less hateful, they will only make them less calmly absurd. That is a gain to the Government, not to us or to justice. The only provisions that would make deportation a reasonable though still autocratic measure of State would be to allow the Viceroy to deport a person, stating the charge against him, for a period of not more than six months and oblige the Government to provide the deportee on release with full particulars as to the nature of the information on which he was deported, so that he might seek redress against malicious slander by individuals or, if it were considered impolitic to disclose the sources of information, for wanton and arbitrary imprisonment by the authorities. The measure would still be oppressive but it would then give some chance to an aggrieved and innocent man, so long as a sense of justice and some tradition of independence still linger in the higher tribunals of the land. Such a measure would have been a moderate measure and would have left the essential absolutism of Government in India unchanged. But even to this the Bill does not rise. It is noticeable that the only Irish Nationalist whose name was on the Bill repudiated it as soon as he heard Mr. Mackarness' speech, on the ground that he had been under the impression that the Bill went much farther than was now stated. The other names were those of British Liberals or Conservatives. This is significant of the difference between the sympathy we may expect even from conscientious English Liberals and the real fellow-feeling of a Nationalist who has himself known what it is to live under the conditions of bureaucratic coercion. Mr. Mackarness has fought the cause of the deportees in the spirit of genuine Liberalism, but his Bill is a concession to that watery British substitute for it which is only Imperialism afraid of its convictions.

THE KATHA UPANISHAD.

FIRST PART; FIRST CHAPTER.

1. Vajasravas, desiring, gave all he had. Now Vajasravas had a son named Nachicatus.

2. As the gifts of the sacrifice went by, faith seized on the boy's pure heart and he pondered:

3. "Kine that have drunk their last water, [eaten their last grass, yielded their last milk, worn out their organs, of Undelight are the worlds to which he goeth that giveth these."

4. Therefore he said to his father, "Me to whom wilt thou give?" Twice he said it and a third time he said it: then his father said, "To Death I give thee."

5. Nachicatus said, "Among many I walk the first, among many I walk the midmost; something Death meaneth to do which to-day by me he will accomplish."

6. Lock luck, O my father, to what the men of old were, lock round to what they are that they have come after. Man that is mortal withers like the grass of the field and like the grass of the field is born again."

7. His attendants said to Yama, "Like fire a guest entereth into the house that is a Brahmin, therefore men hasten to appease him. O son of Vivaasvan, bring the guest-water."

8. That man of little understanding in whose house a Brahmin sitteth fasting, all his hope and his expectation, the companionship he hath kept with saints, the virtue of kind words he hath spoken, the wells he hath dug and the sacrifices he hath offered, all his sons and all his cattle go from him to that guest unhonoured."

9. Yama said. "Because for three nights thou hast dwelt in my house fasting, O Brahmin, a guest worthy of reverence,—O Brahmin, salutation to thee, and to me peace and felicity,—there fore three boons do thou choose, for each night a boon."

10. Nachicatus said. "Tranquillised in feeling, gracious and serene be the Gautama, my father, let his sorrow for my sake pass away from him, let him know it is, I, let him greet me from thy grasp, O Death, delivered. This is the first boon of the three I choose, O Yama."

11. Yama said. "Even as before shall he know thee and believe, from me released, Auddalaky Arouny, thy father sweetly shall he sleep at night and his sorrow pass away from him, having seen thee rescued from the jaws of death, O Nachicatus."

12. Nachicatus said. "In heaven there is not any terror, in heaven, O Death, thou art not, the fear of old age ceaseth; crossing over hunger and death as over two rivers, leaving sorrow far behind, the soul in heaven only rejoiceth."

13. Therefore that celestial fire, O Death, which thou studiast, expound to me, for I believe. They who know Him are the people of heaven and their portion is immortality. This for second boon I have chosen."

14. Yama said. "Hearken to me O Nachicatus, I will expound to thee the celestial fire, for well do I know him. He is the possession of infinity and the foundation of existence: in the secret heart he is established, for such know him O Nachicatus."

15. Of Fire, the world's eldest, he told him, what are the bricks to him and what their number, and the manner of his building, and Nachicatus repeated what he told. Then Death was pleased and said to him yet farther;

16. Yea, he said to him, gratified the mighty mind, the Great One; "Yet a farther boon today I give thee, for by thy name shall this fire be called. This necklace also take, a necklace of many figures."

17. He that lighteth the three fires of Nachicatus and uniteth himself with the three and doeth the triple works, passeth beyond death and birth for ever. He knoweth and seeth the God of our adoration who is omniscient and born of the Eternal Brahman and he attaineth utterly the peace.

18. When a man kindleth the three fires of Nachicatus, when he knoweth this threefold and so knowing heapeth the fire of Nachicatus, he thrusteth from him the cords of Death and leaving sorrow far behind entereth heaven rejoicing.

19. This, O Nachicatus, is the celestial fire which thou didst choose for second boon, and of this fire the world shall speak as thine. Choose yet a third boon, O Nachicatus."

20. Nachicatus said "This that men debate about the spirit that has passed and some say "he yet is" and others "He is not", this I would know from thy teaching, the third boon of the boons is this is, O Yama."

21. Yama said. "Even the gods debated this of old, for it is no easy riddle and very subtle is the law of it. Choose another boon, O Nachicatus; importune me not, no, nor urge me. This, this abandon."

22. Nachicatus said. "Even the gods debated this of old, it seemeth, and thou thyself sayest it is no easy riddle. None shall I find who can tell me of this as thou canst, nor is there any other boon at all that is its equal."

23. Yama said. "Choose sons and grandsons that shall live each a hundred years, choose many cattle, choose elephants and gold and horses, choose a mighty reach of earth and thyself live for as many year as thou listest."

24. This boon if thou deemest equal to thy asking, choose then riches and termless life, be king over a mighty country, O Nachicatus. I give thee thy will of all desirable things for thy portion."

25. Yea, all things that are desirable and hard to win by mortals, all these demand at thy pleasure. Lo, these glorious women with chariots and with bugles, their like is not to be won by human beings, these I give thee, live with these for thy slavegirls. But of death question not, O Nachicatus."

26. Nachicatus said. "Today man enjoyeth these, O Death, and tomorrow they are not, surely they turn to decrepitude the glory of the senses. Yea, all life is but for a moment. Thine be these chariots, and thine the dancing of these women and their singing."

27. Man findeth no satisfaction in wealth, yea, and wealth I shall have since I have beheld thee, and shall live as long as thou art my master. That boon will I choose and no other."

28. Man that groweth old and dwelleth down on the unhappy earth, when he hath entered the presence of the ageless immortals and knoweth, yea, when he looketh very close at beauty and enjoyment and pleasure, what delight can he take in over-long living?

29. That of which they debate, O Death, do thou tell me, even the truth of that mighty passage. Than this boon entering into the secret of secrets no other chooseth Nachicatus."

THE MESSAGE OF THE EAST.

In the relations between India and England since the beginning of the nineteenth century, two different and complementary tendencies have been at work, the relative significance of which is sometimes overlooked. These are the respective influences exercised by the culture and civilisation of each country upon the other. It is true that the Anglicisation of the East has been sufficiently obvious: the corresponding Indianisation of the West is often overlooked. For the first process manifests upon the surface of things, the other in more hidden ways.

In the realm of the practical, empirical and material life, India has been roused to a realisation of the fact that, in her devotion to the highest things, she has carried too far her indifference to the concrete. Stung by a sense of her own impotence, she seeks to-day to hold her own in efficiency and in manufacture against the nations of the West. The impulse towards this mastery of the concrete, the critical and historical sense, and above all the restatement of her own intuitions in the more exact terms of modern science, are the things which India will owe to the West.

The complementary lesson is the 'Message of the East.' The western nations, after a period of unparalleled success in the investigation of the concrete world, the 'conquest of nature,' and the adaptation of mechanical contrivances to the material ends of life, are approaching in every department a certain critical period. The far-reaching developments of commercialism are undermining their own stability. One-tenth of the British population dies in the goal, the workhouse or the lunatic asylum. The increasing contrast between extremes of wealth and poverty, the unemployed and many other urgent problems point the same moral. Extreme developments of vulgarity and selfishness imply the necessary reaction. In science, the limit of possible investigation by physical means is in sight. The main body of scientific men cannot much longer avoid the necessity for the investigation of super-physical phenomena of the new psychology have made an obsolete science of the old. In all the arts, the extreme development of the scientific, scientific, and observing faculties has almost extinguished creative power. Science has corrupted art, until the aims of both are confused. And while on the one hand 'scientific materialism' is already out of date, the old religious formulas are more and more rapidly losing their hold on the best and most sincere minds. Even the accepted formulae of conventional morality are questioned by the most advanced thinkers. In every department of life there is evidence of the culmination of a particular line of development, and the imminent necessity of some new synthesis.

The inwardness of these circumstances has been observed in various ways. England with a blindness characteristic of a youthful and materially successful country has conceived that it has been her mission not merely to awaken and unite, but to civilize India. Only very gradually is England realizing the truth of Sir Thomas Munro's declaration, that if civilization were to be used to attack or commerce between the two countries, she would soon be heavily in debt. There is already abundant evidence of that permeation of western thought by Indian philosophy which Schopenhauer so clearly fore-saw. The East has indeed revealed a new world to the West which will be the inspiration of a 'Renaissance' more profound and far-reaching than that which resulted from the re-discovery of the classic world of the west. It is the irony of fate that while the outward and visible Anglicisation of the East is only too apparent, this inward and subtle Indianisation of the West has, as it were, stolen a march in the night, and already there are groups of western thinkers whose purposes and principles are more truly Indian than are those of the average English-educated Indian of today. The Western no longer afford to ignore the wisdom of the East in any single department of culture.

The 'new Theology' is little else than Hinduism. The Theosophical movement is directly due to the stimulus of Indian thought. The socialist finds that he is striving for very much that which for two or three milleniums has been part and parcel of the fundamentally democratic structure of Indian society.* Exhibitions of Indian art are organised in London for the education of the people. The profound influence which Indian philosophy is destined to exert on Western thought and life is already evident. Indian science had a far-reaching effect on the development of certain aspects of mathematics earlier in the sixteenth century, and is now exerting its influence in other ways. Much of the modern theory of Western science goes to confirm and justify the intuitions of the old Indian religious-scientific writers, and they in their turn are proving suggestive to the modern worker. And finally, small group of artists and musicians—those particularly whose minds are most attuned to the great art of mediæval Europe—are turning their eyes towards the East for inspiration. "When new inspiration comes into European art," says a recent English writer, "it will come again from the East." It is of this coming of the East that I now write.

The chief characteristic of the bulk of modern European art—the art of the Salons and the Royal Academy—is a great development of imitative power. The exhibition walls are hung with studies in still life—studies of landscapes, of trees and animals and of human beings in every sort of situation and moved by every kind of feeling. Much of this is the expression in art of a comparatively new appreciation of nature in all her varying moods, an appreciation which (though characteristic of early Celtic literature) in modern times found just expression only in the Romantic Revival of the early sixteenth century, representing a healthy reaction from the false sentiment of the preceding century. At the same time, the love of nature in all her moods has increased by a natural compensatory tendency in proportion as human life has been divorced from nature. It is in the absence of nature, in the artificial life of towns, that we need pictures of nature's outward form to call up within us the memory of far-off peace and beauty. No one in the constant presence of his mistress needs at the same time her picture. It is only in absence that a picture is desired—and even so, perhaps he is the better lover who needs no picture in concrete form having a more perfect memory picture in his heart. The modern habit of dotting the walls of a house with framed pictures of beautiful things was unknown in the days when all the accessories of life itself were beautiful.

Such realistic art, however, when we consider so much of it as selects, appreciates and emphasizes the beautiful and the true, is educative alike to artist and to public, in the sense that we 'love things best first when we see them painted. This is also a necessary stage towards a higher synthesis. I cannot better express the significance, immediate and future, of this 'return to nature', than in the following words taken from a letter lately received from an English artist friend:—"What you say about design and the need for the type rather than the realistic nature study so exactly fits my own theory of doing that I am at once flattered and confirmed. Yet I would not for worlds discourage the affectionately interested, often passionate study of natural forms which one sees in young students' work now-a-days, because not only would that deprive them of a world of pleasure and a source of real education, it would perhaps shut the door on what I feel is the beginning of a great advance in artistic achievement. It is true that this artistic achievement may not be attained by these same students, but it will be largely the result of their studies. The racial mind will be a new 'troupe' dans le vrai, and out of the infinitely various studies, the type image will emerge." Realism thus regarded, marks a necessary stage in a return from artificiality to truth. India merely cannot remain untouched by the necessity for a similar transition period.

At the same time, there is an ever present danger of finding permanent satisfaction in the perfecting of this 'lesser appreciative' art, of becoming so absorbed in the concrete and phenomenal as to wholly forget the abstract and the ideal. Those who defend realism as an ultimate aim make this mistake. Even more fatal is the view that makes the significance of art lie solely or primarily in the perfection of its own technique, the subject matter becoming indifferent, until at last many realists depict equally willingly the hideous and the beautiful, sometimes apparently by definite choice preferring the former, so that the term 'realistic' in art and literature has come to mean the detailed presentation of the unpleasant. But even apart from this obvious evil, satisfaction in the development and exercise of the imitative powers, carried to excess, precludes the evolution of the creative.

The essential limitation of this realistic presentation of natural beauty lies in the restriction to a definite point in space and time and in the mingling of desire with emotion: "the impression of the beautiful fades away in proportion as any relation of the beautiful object to the desires of the subject enters his consciousness." The element of the sensuous tends to prevail over that of emotional delight and there is a degradation from an attitude of disinterested exaltation, to that of desire to experience the pleasure associated in the mind with the objects represented. This is particularly obvious, for example, in the treatment of the nude, where the realistic manner excites or tends to excite desire and draws us "away from aesthetic contemplation to the sphere of individual willing." The same is equally true of a landscape picture that rather suggests a desire to be back again in so fair a place, than conveys a disinterested emotion or idea. Desires thus awakened, it should be noted, may be very far from wrong, but their awakening does not belong to the best that art can give us. What that best is, we shall see later. The Modern Review.

JHALAKATI CONFERENCE.

SRIJUT AUROBINDO GHOSE'S SPEECH.

Fellow-countrymen, delegates and people of Barisal and Backergunge:—

I have first to express to you my personal gratitude for the kindly reception you have accorded to me. For a year I have been secluded from the fellowship and brotherly embrace of my fellow-countrymen. To me, therefore, the kindness of your welcome must awake much keener feelings than would have been the case in other circumstances. Especially it is a cause of rejoicing to me to have that welcome in Barisal. When I come to this District, when I come to this soil of Backer-gunge which has been made sacred and ever memorable in the history of this country—I come to no ordinary place. When I come to Barisal, I come to the chosen temple of the Mother—I come to a sacred pithan of the national spirit—I come to the birth-place and field of work of Aswini Kumar Datta.

TROUBLES OF BARISAL.

It is now the fourth year since I came to Barisal first on the occasion of the Provincial Conference. Three years have passed since then—they have been years of storm and stress to the country,—they have been years during which history has been making, during which the people of India have been undergoing a process of re-birth. Many things have happened in these years, especially in the last few months. One sign of what has been happening in the past is this empty chair (pointing to the chair upon which Aswini Kumar's photo was placed.) One aspect of these years has been a series of repressions. They have been years in which the country has had to undergo the sufferings and sacrifices which repression involves. Barisal has had its full share of these sufferings. They had begun even before I had come among you. You had then the regulation lathi of the Police and the Gurkha visitation.
After that there have been other forms of coercion. In this very town of Jhalakati you had to pay a punitive police tax. It was a punitive tax, punitive not of any offence of which you have been guilty,—for, you have been guilty of none. In Barisal, there was no disturbance, no breach of the law. On the contrary, you have always been patient and self-restrained—you have always kept within the four corners of the law. What you have been punished for was your patriotism—you were punished for your Swadeshiism—you were punished for your successful organisation of boycott. That tax was borne by the mahajans of Jhalakati with the readiness and uncomplaining endurance of large-hearted patriotism.

THE DEPORTATIONS.

And now there have come the deportations.
You have been called to endure the exile of those who have been dearest to you, who stood for all that was patriotic and noble in the district. Of the deportation Barisal has had more than its full share. Of those deported three are sons of this district. The man whose name will live for ever on the lips of his countrymen as one of the great names of the age—one of the makers of the new nation—Aswini Kumar Datta has been taken away from you. His active and devoted lieutenant has been taken away from you. That warm-hearted patriot whom I am proud to have had the privilege of calling my personal friend—Monoranjan Guha—has been taken away from you. Why have they been exiled? What was their offence? Can anyone in Barisal name a single action—can anyone of those who have sent him into exile name definitely any single action which Aswini Kumar Datta has committed, of which the highest and noblest man might not be proud? Can anyone name a single action of Krishna Kumar Mitra's which would be derogatory to the reputation of the highest in the land? There have indeed been charges—vague charges, shameless charges,—made. The law under which they have been exiled requires no charge. The law under which they have been exiled has been impugned in Parliament as an antiquated and anomalous Regulation, utterly out of place and unfit to be used in modern times. When it was so attacked and its use by the Government of India challenged, Lord Morley, the man who rules India with absolute sway and stands or should stand to us as the incarnation of British statesmanship, made an answer which was not the answer of a statesman but of an attorney. "The law" he said, "is as good a law as any on the Statute Book". What is meant—what does Lord Morley mean—by a "good law"? In a certain sense every law is good law which is passed by an established authority. If there were a law which made swadeshi illegal by which to buy a Swadeshi cloth would become a criminal action punishable by a legal tribunal—there have been such laws in the past; and if that were enacted by the Legislative Council it would be in Lord Morley's sense of the word as good a law as any up on the Statute book. But would it be a good law in the true sense or a travesty of law and justice? Lord Morley says it is a good law.

We say it is a lawless law, a dishonest law,—a law that is in any real sense of the word, no law at all. For what is its substance and purpose?
It provides that when you cannot bring any charge against a man which can be supported by proofs and when you have no evidence which would stand for a moment before a court of justice, in any legal tribunal—when you have nothing against him except that his existence is inconvenient to you, then you need not advance any charge, you need not bring any evidence, you are at liberty to remove him from his home, from his friends, from his legitimate activities and intern him for the rest of his life in a jail. This is the law which is as good a law as any on the Statute Book! But what does its presence on the Statute Book mean? It means that under certain circumstances or whenever an absolute authority chooses, there is no law in the land for any subject of the British Crown —no safety for the liberty of the person. It is under this law that nine of the most devoted workers for the country have been exiled, some of whose names are household words in India and incompatible with any imputation of evil.
When the authorities were pressed in Parliament for an account of the reasons for their action they would not bring and refused to bring any definite accusation. Once indeed under the pressure of cross-examination a charge was advanced, —wild, vague and baseless. It was said in effect that these men were instigators and paymasters of anarchy and bloodshed. What was the authority under which such a charge was made?
How was it that this monstrous falsehood was allowed to proceed from the mouths of His Majesty's Minister and pollute the atmosphere of the House of Commons? Is there a man in his senses who will believe that Aswini Kumar Dutta was the instigator and paymaster of anarchy and bloodshed or that Krishna Kumar Mitra was the instigator and paymaster of anarchy and bloodshed,—men whose names were synonymous for righteousness of action and nobility of purposes and whose whole lives were the embodiment of uprightness, candour and fair and open living before all men? We have been told that it was not only on police evidence that they were exiled. That was not what was said at the beginning. At first it was on police information that the deportations were justified and any attempt to impugn that authority was resented. But now that police information has been shown to be false and unreliable, it is said that there was other than police information to justify the action of the authorities. We know what that information must have been. I will not make any sweeping charge against a whole body of men without exception. I know that even among the police there are men who are upright and observe truth and honesty in their dealings. I have met such men and honoured them. But we know what the atmosphere of that department is, we know what the generality of police officers are and how little reliance can be placed upon them. Of the value of police information Midnapore is the standing and conclusive proof. Besides this police information what else there have been? Obviously the information on which the police has relied in certain of these cases—the evidence of the hired perjurer and forger, of the approver who to save himself from a baseless charge makes allegations yet more unfounded against others and scatters mud on the most spotless reputations in the land. If there were any other source besides this, we know too what that must have been. There are a sprinkling of Vibhishans among us—men who for their own ends are willing to tell any lie that they think will please the authorities or injure their personal enemies. But if the Government in this country have upon such information believed that the lives of Aswini Kumar Dutta and Krishna Kumar Mitra are a mere mask and not the pure and spotless lives we have known, then we must indeed say "what an amount of folly and ignorance rules at the present moment in this unhappy country."

"THE HAMMER OF GOD."

Well, we have had many other forms of repression besides these deportations. We have had charges of sedition, charges of dacoity and violence, brought against the youngmen who are the hope of our country—charges such as those which we have seen breaking down and vanishing into nothing when tested by a high and impartial tribunal. This is the nature of the repression we have been called upon to suffer. It has been so engineered by the underlings of the Government that it strikes automatically at those who are most energetic, most devoted, most self-denying in the service of the mother country. It addresses itself to the physical, the outward manifestations of our national life, and seeks by suppressing them to put an end to that national life and movement. But it is a strange idea, a foolish idea, which men have, indeed, always cherished under such circumstances, but which has been disproved over and over again in history—to think that a nation which has once risen,—once has been called up by the voice of God to rise—will be stopped by mere physical repression. It has never so happened in the history of a nation, nor will it so happen in the history of India. Storm has swept over us to-day. I saw it come. I saw the striding of the storm-blast and the rush of the rain and as I saw it an idea came to me. What is this storm that is so mighty and sweeps with such fury upon us? And I said in my heart "It is God who rides abroad on the wings of the hurricane,—it is the might and force of the Lord that manifested itself and His A mighty hands that seized and shook the roof so violently over our heads to-day." A storm like this has swept also our national life. That too was the manifestation of the Almighty. We were building an edifice to be the temple of our Mother's worship—were rearing her a new and fair mansion, a place fit for her dwelling. It was then that He came down upon us. He flung himself upon the building we had raised. He shook the roof with His mighty hands and part of the building was displaced and ruined. Why has He done this? Repression is nothing but the hammer of God that is beating us into shape so that we may be moulded into a mighty nation and an instrument for His work in the world. We are iron upon His anvil and the blows are showering upon us not to destroy but to re-create. Without suffering there can be no strength,—without sacrifice there can be no growth. It is not in vain that Aswini Kumar has been taken from his people. It is not in vain that Krishna Kumar Mitra has been taken from us and is rotting in Agra Jail. It is not in vain that all Maharashtra mourns for Tilak at Mandabay. It is He, not any other, Who has taken them and His ways are not the ways of men but He is all-wise. He knows better than we do what is needful for us. He has taken Aswini Kumar Dutta away from Barisal. Is the movement dead? Is Swadeshi dead? The rulers of the country in their scanty wisdom have thought that by lopping off the heads the movement will cease. They do not know that great as he is, Aswini Kumar Dutta is not the leader of this movement, that Tilak is not the leader. —God is the leader. They do not know the storm that has been sweeping over the country was not sent by them, but by Him for His own great purposes. And the same strength that was manifested in the storm to-day and in the storm of calamity that has passed over the country—the same strength is in us.

OUR "SPIRITUAL STRENGTH."

And if they are mighty to afflict, we are mighty to endure. We are no ordinary race. We are a people ancient as our hills and river and we have behind us a history of manifold greatness, not surpassed by any other race, we are the descendants of those who performed tapasya and underwent unheard of austerities for the sake of spiritual gain and of their own will submitted to all the sufferings of which humanity is capable. We are the children of those mothers who ascended with a smile the funeral pyre that they might follow their husbands to another world. We are a people to whom suffering is welcome and who have a spiritual strength within them, greater than any physical force, we are a people in whom God has chosen to manifest Himself more than any other at many great moments of our history. It is because God has chosen to manifest Himself and has entered into the hearts of his people that we are rising again as a nation. Therefore it matters not even if those who are great and most loved are taken away. Trust in God's mercy and believe that they will soon be restored to us. But even if they don't come again still the movement will not cease. It will move forward irresistibly until God's will is fulfilled. He fulfils His purposes inevitably and those too He will fulfil. Those who are taken from us must after all some day pass away. We are strong in their strength. We have worked in their inspiration. But in the inevitable course of nature they will pass from us and there must be others who will take their places. He has taken them away from us for a little in order that in their absence we might feel that it was not really in their strength that we were strong in their inspiration that we worked but that a Higher Force was working in them and when they are removed, can still work in the hearts of the people. When they pass away others will arise or even if no great men stand forth to lead, still the soul of this people will be great with the force of God within and do the work. This it is that He seeks to teach us by these separations—by these calamities. The men are gone. The movement has not ceased. The National School at Jhalakati was started one month after the deportation of Aswini Kumar Dutta, that is a patent sign that the movement is not as our rulers would ignorantly have it, got up by eloquent agitators. The movement goes on by the force of nature; it works as force of nature works and goes inevitable on, whatever obstacle comes in the way.

OUR OBJECT.

What is it that this movement seeks, not according to the wild chimeras born of unreasoning fear but in its real aim and purpose? What is it that we seek? We seek the fulfilment of our life as a nation. This is what the word Swaraj, which is a bug bear and terror to the Europeans, really means. When they hear it, they are full of unreasoning terrors. They think swaraj is independence, it is freedom and that means that the people are going to rise against them in rebellion, that means there are bombs behind every bush, that every volunteer who gives food to his famine-stricken countrymen or nurses the cholera-stricken is a possible rebel and dacoit. Swaraj is not the Colonial form of Government nor any form of Government. It means the fulfilment of our national life. That is what we seek, that is why God has sent us into the world to fulfil Him by fulfilling ourselves in our individual life, in family, in the community, in the nation, in humanity. That is why He has sent us to the world and it is this fulfilment that we demand, for this fulfilment is life and to depart from it is to perish. Our object, our claim is that we shall not perish as a nation, but live as a nation. Any authority that goes against this object will dash itself against the eternal throne of justice—it will dash itself against the laws of nature which are the laws of God, and be broken to pieces.

OUR MEANS.

This then is our object and by what means do we seek it? We seek it by feeling our separateness and pushing forward our individual self-fulfilment by what we call Swadeshi—Swadeshi in commerce and manufacture, in politics, in education, in law and administration, in every branch of national activity. No doubt this means independence, it means freedom; but it does not mean rebellion. There are some who fear to use the word "freedom," but I have always used the word because it has been the mantra of my life to aspire towards the freedom of my nation. And when I was last in jail I clung to that mantra; and through the mouth of my counsel I used this word persistently. What he said for me—and it was said not only on my behalf, but of all who cherish this ideal,—was this: If to aspire to independence and preach freedom is a crime you may cast me into jail and there bind me with chains. If to preach freedom is a crime then I am a criminal and let me be punished. But freedom does not mean the use of violence—it does not mean bombs; it is the fulfilment of our separate national existence. If there is any authority mad enough to declare that Swadeshi, national education, and Swadeshi association for improvement of our physique, is illegal it is not stamping out anarchism; it is on the contrary establishing a worse anarchism from above. It sets itself against the law of God that gives to every nation their primary rights. The Judge in the Alipore case said that the aspiration after independence and the preaching of the ideal of independence was a thing no Englishman could condemn. But if you say that the aspiration after independence is a thing done run endema and yet put down by force the only powerful means of securing independence you are really declaring that it is the practice of independence which you will not tolerate. Because a few have gone mad and broken the law you have chosen to brand a whole people, to condemn a nation and to suppress a whole national movement. With that we have nothing to do. We have no voice in the Government of our country: and the laws and their administration are things in which you don't allow us to have any concern. But one thing is in our own power: our courage and devotion are in our power our sacrifice, our suffering are in our power that you cannot take away from us, and so long as you cannot take that from us you can do nothing. Your repression cannot for ever continue, for it will bring anarchy into the country. You will not be able to continue your administration if this repression remains permanent. Your Government will become disorganised; the trade you are using such means to save will become and capital be frightened from the country.

CONCLUSION.

We have therefore only to suffer. We have only to be strong and enduring. All this machinery of coercion, all this repression, will then be in vain. That is the only virtue that is needed. We shall never lose our fortitude, our courage, our endurance. There are some who think that by lowering our heads the country will escape repression. That is not my opinion. It is by looking the storm in the face and meeting it with a high courage, fortitude and endurance that the nation can be saved. It is that which the Mother demands from us,—which God demands from us. He sent the storm yesterday and it carried the roof away. He sent it to-day with greater violence and it seized the roof to remove it. But to-day the roof remained. This is what He demands of us.—"I have sent my storms upon you, so that you may feel and train your strength. If you have suffered by them, if something has been broken, it does not matter, so long as you learn the lesson that it is for strength I make you suffer and always for strength." What did the volunteers do to-day when they flung themselves in crowds on the roof and braved the fury of the hurricane and by main strength held down the roof over their heads? That is the lesson that all must learn and especially the young men of Bengal and India. The storm may come down on us again and with greater violence. Then remember this, brave its fury, feel your strength, train your strength in the struggle with the violence of the wind, and by that strength hold down the roof over the temple of the Mother.

INDUSTRIAL NOTES.

THE LAMONE EXHIBITION.—Professor Bhoji Ram Sahni, of the Local Government College, has been placed on special duty in connection with the coming Industrial and Agricultural Exhibition.

SWADESHI.—Mr. Sarada Charan Mitter writes to Rai Bahadur Jodu Nath Mazoomdar, Managing Director of the Jessore Comb, Button and Mat Factory as follows:—"The young and earnest promoter of the Industry (Mr. Ghosh) saw me. I wish to encourage him in every way. I shall myself take 10 shares and ask my friends to take shares."

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.—The following scholars have been selected for scholarships for industrial education in Europe:—Bombay,—R. V. Gurjar, processes of bleaching dyeing and printing in mills; B. R. Pradhan, electrical and mechanical engineering. Bengal—Mannatha Nath Bysack, Textile Chemistry with special reference to the dyeing, printing and bleaching, textile fabrics. Punjab—M. Nawabuddin, tanning industry. Burma,—Maung Po Thein mining engineering. E. B. and Assam Srijit Giriish Chandra Bardalai, mining engineering. C. P.—Salyid Faizuddin, leather tanning.

TARPUR SUGAR WORKS & LD.—WRITES THE BENGALER.—We have great pleasure to note that the above Company has been revived under the auspices of a strong Board of Directors consisting of the Maharaja of Cossimbazar, Mr. Sarada Charan Mitra and others. The objects of the Company are (1) to manufacture sugar, especially date-sugar, without the use of animal charcoal or any substance which may be repugnant to religious feelings; (2) to prepare useful trade articles out of the by-products and wastages after the manufacture of sugar, and (3) to develop new industries by utilisation of the extra forces of the very powerful engines with which the Company's machine is fitted. It is expected to turn out 400 maunds of sugar and 750 maunds of molasses daily. The capital of the Company has been fixed at Rs. 4,00,000 divided into 16,000 shares of Rs. 25 each. We wish this Swadeshi enterprise every success, and hope that the shares will be speedily taken up. Gentlemen willing to purchase share will please apply to Mr. Sarada Charan Mitra, 85, Grey Street, Calcutta.

INDIAN PLUMAGE.—Business men in Calcutta will be interested to hear that Lord Morley has been approached with the object of securing withdrawal of the notification of September the 19th, 1902, prohibiting the export of bird skins and plumage from India. This action has been taken by a joint Committee of the East India and the China Trade Section and the Textile Trade Section of the London Chamber of Commerce. It will be recalled that in his lecture at the Society of Arts in December last, Mr. Douglas Dewar stated that though exports are prohibited, they still continue in some degree, the law being evaded by means of false declarations. He said that large numbers of Indian birds had been sold in London since the passing of the prohibitory Act of 1903.

NEWS.

Prisoners Taken. The Jorabager Police on Monday produced before the Commissioner of Police, a Marwari merchant named Sancha Lal, of Purneah, and his darwan, Roop Singh, who were arrested on Sunday having in their possession a large amount of silver jewellery valued about Rs. 5000 which they were negotiating to sell among the merchants at Monchatta Street. The police suspected that the jewellery was stolen property. The first accused stated that he had purchased the jewellery from famine-stricken villagers in the Purneah District. Encouraged to show that within the past three or four months the second and other Marwari merchants had purchased jewellery to the value of about Rs. 25000 from the famine-stricken villagers at exceptionally low rates and sold them in Calcutta at the ordinary market price of silver thereby reaping a rich harvest at the expense of the distressed villagers of Purneah.

CASE AGAINST THE "ENGLISHMAN." The suit brought by Lohi Lajpat Rai against H. N. Munir, A. E. Deschamps, Editors, and R. L. Gupta, Printer, of the "Englishman" claiming Rs. 50,000 as damages for alleged defamation was heard by Mr. Justice Fry here on the 25th and 26th June. The defendants in their written statement admitted the publication, but stated that the plaintiff had not specifically set out any charges and imputations, that the plaintiff declared no cause of action, that the words complained of were comment and criticism on a matter of public interest, that the words contained no allegation of fact, that they were published in the belief that they were true, that they were fair comments made in good faith without malice, that the publication had not injured the plaintiff in his reputation and that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendants. Mr. Norton, counsel for the defence, asked leave to read the 14th and 15th paragraphs of the written statement by adding the second and they were published on "privileged occasions." He was not allowed to do so. Judgment has been reserved.

Five Prisoners Taken. One Hindu Nath Basu of Jessore expired at the Calcutta Medical College Hospital on the 15th February. In his dying declaration he said that he had been suspected of having taken part in a theft at the Naldanga Rajbari and was seized by the Police. He said: "At midnight the Kaligang Daroga and Jannadar of the Rajbari ordered me to be beaten and they said that I should either be beaten to death or the stolen things should remain uncovered. The Rajbari came in, two more Raj servants and one constable then began to assault me. After that they pulled and pressed a handkerchief over my eyes and I became almost unconscious. They then confined me in the gupt dahan (house of worship), at 8 or 9 A.M. next day, when Kungu came, they sent me away with two coolies. Kungu told me that he had been made to write out and sign a hand note for Rs. 500 by the Raja's men and that he must not allow me to bring any case against the Raja's men or the Police." After a prolonged enquiry the Jury expressed the opinion that death was due to torture inflicted by the Raj men and the Police. We hope Mr. Stevenson Moore, the late Magistrate of Jessore still remembers his old friend the Raja of Naldanga.

Social Equality. The Morning Post published the following: "On Friday evening the 11th June, the two sons of a well-known and wealthy Indian Raja were travelling from Delhi to Rajputana. They had reserved two first class berths in the Rajputana mail. A British military officer, it seems, was travelling by the same train. When he got into the carriage, he found the two young Indian princes there, and with that peculiar form of Anglo-Indian insolence which is not entirely a novelty in India, he demanded that his two fellow-passengers should clear out. They objected. The officer, then, we understand, threatened to chuck them out, and as his attitude lent colour to the belief that he intended to enforce his threat by the exercise of physical violence, one of the young Indians, thoroughly aroused, drew a revolver. Then there was trouble in real earnest. The police were called, the station authorities hurried up and the infuriated Major laid up a charge against those whom he deemed to be his assailants. The followers of the two young princes were armed and they themselves were detained in the station under surveillance during the night until the next morning. In the meanwhile, the princes had wired to their father who at once sent them some thousands of rupees with instructions to get the best counsel possible and fight the case. He also wired to His Majesty the King and to Lord Minto, the result of this action being that all idea of a criminal prosecution was at once dropped and in common parlance the matter was 'hushed up.'

With you Brown. The Khulna Advocate publishes the following: "In a recent letter our Jullunder correspondent pointed out certain instances of what he calls the working of barbarous laws in Cantonnments, one of which is that any Indian may be deported out of Cantonnment limits at the mere whim and pleasure of the Cantonnment Magistrate for an offence whatever, or for what may be considered as offence by any swollen-headed military officer. 'The existence of such a law and the absolute refusal of any civil status to the Indian population of Cantonnments lead to strange incidents such as were reported by our correspondent, and two fresh cases of which nature have just occurred in the military town of Solon. It appears that the Indian passing by with the umbrella over his head is an indignity which the totary of Mar cannot bear, and now that Lord Morley is bragging of having ushered in the millennium in India by the Reform scheme and the deportations, it is time the Government issued some specific instructions to prevent further such as may be caused by cases like the following reported by a trustworthy correspondent. We will let him tell the story in his own words. "The small town of Solon in the Simla District has become a little too hot for the Indian gentry residing there, owing to the misbehaviour of some of the military officers stationed in the Cantonnment. The first victim was Mr. Dev Ratan of the Dev Samaj, a religious body, having its summer headquarters at Solon. The gentleman was met by four Subalterns one day and ordered to take off his umbrella. Mr. Dev Ratan could not see his way to comply with this improper request, whereupon the Subalterns threatened him with bull sticks which however, they had the good sense not to actually bring into action. The second and still worse was the treatment meted out to an Indian Christian of high culture and position, Mr. Golak Nath, who is residing here temporarily with his wife and children, was one day ordered by a couple of Subalterns to take off his umbrella. Mr. Golak Nath protested but in vain. He was not allowed to proceed unless he took off the umbrella, a demand which Mr. Golak Nath had no other alternative but to comply with, as the Subalterns had assumed a threatening attitude. Mr. Golak Nath, who is a great admirer of the English, has been very greatly upset by this incident. He is the brother of Mr. Charles Golak Nath, Barrister-at-Law of Lahore, and is very closely related to some of the personal friends of the Viceroy himself. Such incidents ought to be stopped with a strong hand. As at present there are several Indian ladies and gentlemen, also some of the Dev Samaj School going to Solon in their bungalows and the roads are so very frequently visited by Military European Officers and men that unless a check is put on such incidents, these may someday lead to serious consequences." The time of "knives and pistols" may be ended as Lord Morley hopes, by the policy of deportations, but the days of Indians being turned out of Railway carriages or called upon to take down their umbrellas by upstart Englishmen threaten to go on and on for ever.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

An unequal fight.

Our controversy with the Bengalee is like a conflict between denizens of two different elements. Not only has our contemporary the advantage of prompt reply, but he has such a giant's gulp for formulas, such a magnificent and victorious method of dealing with great fundamental questions in a few sentences, such a generous faculty for clouding a definite point with sounding generalisations that he leaves us weak and gasping for breath. However in our own feeble way we shall try to deal with the several points he has raised. Their importance must be our excuse for the length of our reply. One great difficulty in our way is that our contemporary for the convenience of his argument chooses to attribute to us the most ridiculous opinions born out of his own prolific brain and generous faculty in reading whatever he chooses into other people's minds. He thinks, for instance, that by seeing a special manifestation of Divine Power and grace in a particular movement we mean to shut God out from all others. This is a fair sample of the "inconsistencies" which the Bengalee is always finding in his own brain and projecting into ours. If we have to guard ourselves at every point against such gratuitous misconceptions, argument becomes impossible. Neither space nor patience will allow of it.

God and His Universe.

The Bengalee takes as its fundamental position that God is Absolute, Eternal and Universal in all movements and not limited to any particular. Very true, but a vague statement of abstract truth like this leads nowhere beyond itself. What are the concrete implications in this generalisation? God is not only the Absolute, Eternal and Universal in his own essence, but He manifests in the relative, transient and particular. The Absolute is an aspect of Him necessary for philosophical completeness; but if He were only Absolute, then this phenomenal world would be only Maya, God akarta and all action purely illusory. If He were only Eternal we might regard this world as something not full of Him, but a separate creation which may or may not be subject to His immediate action. It is because He is the Universal that the clarified vision sees Him in every being and every activity. As the Absolute He stands behind every relative, as the Eternal He supports every transient and asures the permanence of the sum of phenomena, as the Universal He manifests Himself in every particular.

The Scientific Position.

Still, there is the question, how does He manifest Himself? There is a school which holds that He has once for all manifested Himself in certain eternal and universal laws and has no other connection with the universe. This was the attitude definitely taken by the Indian Social Reformer when it ridiculed S. J. Aurobindo Ghose's Uttarpada speech. God does not speak to men through their inner selves in Yoga or otherwise, there is no way of communion between Him and humanity, there is no special action of His power or grace anywhere. He speaks to men only through His laws; in other words He does not speak to them at all. He does not act personally. He acts through His laws; in other words, He does not act at all. His laws act. This is an intelligible position and it contains the whole real quarrel between Science and Religion. Science does not as yet recognise God. Taking its stand on the material senses and logical argument from external phenomena it demands proof before it will admit His existence. It sees plenty of proof of Shakti, of Prakriti, of Nature; it sees none of the Purusha or any room for His existence. If He exists at all, it must be as an Impersonal Being immanent in but different from Force and Energy and Himself inactive; but even of this there is no proof. Religion holds that God is not only impersonal but personal, not only Purusha but Prakriti, not only Being but Shakti; He is all. For the proof of its pos-tion Religion appeals to something higher than logic or the senses, to spiritual experience and the direct knowledge drawn from the secret discipline it has developed in most parts of the world.

Force Universal or Individual.

It is not clear whether our contemporary recognises any personality in its Universal God or only recognises Him in all movements as natural Law. We hold that He manifests Himself in particulars not as Law, which is only a generalisation of the methods by which He acts, but as Shakti working for the Purusha. He puts Himself as force, energy, [motive-power into every particular. It is perfectly true that every particular contains Him, but there are differences in the force of His manifestation. This is obvious in individuals. The strength of every particular individual is the strength of God and not his own, because every particular strength is merely a part of the Universal force and it is really the Universal force and not the individual strength that is acting. But in living, beings when consciousness has become separate, the individual is allowed to suppose himself to be strong in his own strength. He is not really so. God gave the strength and He can take it away. He gave it power to act and He can baffle its action of the fruits the individual sought and turn it to quite other results. This is so common an experience that we do not see how any man with the power of introspection can deny it. Only at ordinary times, when things seem to be moving according to our calculations, we forget it, but on certain occasions He manifests Himself with such force either in events or in our own actions that unless we are blinded by egoism or by infatuation we are compelled to perceive the universality of the force that is acting and the insignificance of the individual. So also there are particular movements in particular epochs in which the Divine Force manifests itself with supreme power shattering all human calculations, making a mock of the prudence of the careful statesman and the scheming politician, falsifying the prognostications of the scientific analyser and advancing with a vehemence and velocity which is obviously the manifestation of a higher than human force. The intellectual man afterwards tries to trace the reasons for the movement and lay bare the forces that made it possible, but at the time he is utterly at fault, his wisdom is falsified at every step and his science serves him not. These are the times when we say God is in the movement, He is its leader and it must fulfil itself however impossible it may be for man to see the means by which it will succeed.

Faith and Deliberation.

The next point is the question of mature deliberation. The Bengalee here tries to avoid confession of its error by altering the meaning of language. The mature deliberation of which it spoke applies only to particular acts and, even then it was not one man or a dozen but the whole self-conscious part of the country which took part in these mature deliberations. The facts do not square with this modified assertion. The majority even of the particular steps taken in pursuance of the ideas which swept over the country were not taken in pursuance of mature deliberation but were the result in some men of a faith which defied deliberation and in others of a yielding to the necessity of the moment. The National Council of Education came into existence because S. J. Subodh Chander Mallik planked down a lakh of rupees and was followed by the zemindar of Gauripur, an act of faith, because the Rangpur school-boys and their guardians refused to go back on their action in leaving the Government school and established a school of their own, also an act of faith, and because some leading men of the country recognized that something must be done on the spot to prevent the honour of the nation being tarnished by abandonment of this heroic forlorn hope while others thought it a good opportunity to materialize their educational crotchets. Was this mature deliberation or a compound of faith, idealism and risky experiment? The Boycott came into existence because of the wrath of the people against the Partition and the vehement advocacy of a Calcutta paper which, supported by this general wrath, bore down the hesitations of the thinkers, the politicians and the economists. Almost every step towards Swadeshi, every National school established was an act of faith in the permanence of the movement, a faith not justified by previous experience. These were acts of boldness, often of rashness, not of mature deliberation. Mature deliberation implies that having consulted the lessons of past experience and weighed the probabilities of the future and the possibilities of the present, we take the step which seems most prudent and likely to bring about sure results. The Bombay millowners deliberated maturely when they said, "This movement born of a moment's indignation will pass like the rest; go to, let us raise our prices and make hay while the sun shines." The leaders deliberated maturely when they said, "The rush towards National Education will not last and if encouraged it will mean the destruction of private institutions and the payment of a double tax for education." So they stopped the student's strike, withheld their moral support and by this mature deliberation put, like the Bombay millowners, almost insuperable obstacles in the way of the movement. It was the unconsciously prepared forces in the country that made their way in spite of and not because of the mature deliberation. It was a minority convinced of the principles of self-help and passive resistance, full of faith, careless of obstacles, believing in the force of ideas, and not the whole self-conscious portion of the country, which mainly contributed, by its eloquence, logic, consistency, self-sacrifice and the impact of its energy on the maturely-deliberating majority, to the permanence of the movement. These are the facts. As for the conclusion from them we never made the absurd statement evolved out of the Bengalee's imagination that God is everywhere except in the conscious and deliberate activities of men. What we say and hold to is that the Divine force manifests itself specially when it effects mighty and irresistible movements which even the ignorance and egoism of man is obliged to recognise as exceeding and baffling his limited wisdom and his limited strength.

Our "Inconsistencies."

A third point is the proposition that out of evil cometh good and that everything that happens or can happen is for the best. Here our contemporary finds an inconsistency, for did we not say that just now everything works for the upraising of India because there is an upward trend which all forces assist. "Curiously enough," he says, "the writer thinks the two propositions identical." Curiously enough, we do. We say that just now India is being raised up and everything tends to God's purpose in raising her up; even calamity, even evil, even error. He uses them for His purpose and out of evil bringeth good. We said "just now," because it is not true that God has always raised up India and always there has been an upward trend; sometimes He has cast her down, sometimes there has been a downward trend. Even that was for the good of India and the world as we shall take occasion to show. Where then is the limitation or the inconsistency? The limitation in the phrase "just now" applies to the upward trend, to the particular instance and not to the principle that out of evil cometh good, which is universal and absolute.

Good out of evil.

It is strange to find a philosopher like our contemporary parading in this twentieth century the ancient and hollow platitude that such a doctrine, however true, ought not to be applied to individual conduct because it will abrogate morality and personal responsibility. This is a strange answer, too, to an argument which simply sought to confirm the faith and endurance of our people in calamity by the belief that our confidence in our future was not mistaken and that these calamities were necessary for God's high purpose. The evil we spoke of was not moral evil, but misfortune and calamity. But we do not shrink from the doctrine that sin also is turned to His purposes and, so far as that goes, we do not see how such a doctrine abrogates morality. The wisdom and love of God in turning our evil into His good does not absolve us of our moral responsibility. Our contemporary shows this want of connection between the two positions himself when he asks whether one should not in that case play the traitor in order to assist the progress of the tendency. The gibe shows up the absurdity not of our faith but of his argument. Our selfish or sinful acts, our persistence in ignorance or perversity are for the best in this obvious sense that God makes out of them excellent material for the work He is about, which always tends to the good of humanity. The persecution of Christianity by the powers of the ancient world was utterly evil, but it was for the best; without it there could not have been that noble reaction of sublime and exalted suffering which finally permeated the human mind with the impulse of sacrifices for high ideals, and by introducing a mental soil fit for the growth of altruism sowed the seeds of love sweetness and humanity in that hard selfish lust-ridden European world. The Bengalee no doubt would have counselled the Christian martyrs not to be so rash and unreasoning but to demand from God a balance of profit and loss for each individual sacrifice and only after mature deliberation decide whether to obey the voice of God in their conscience or offer flowers to Venus and divine homage to Nero.

Loss of courage.

But the question of self-sacrifice needs separate handling and we have not the space to deal with it in this issue as its importance deserves. The Bengalee counters our suggestion about the superfluity of prudence and the instinct of self-preservation at the present moment by the assertion that there is an excess of unreasoning rashness. That is a question of standpoint and vocabulary. But when the Bengalee goes on to say that when evil results ensue from their imprudence the rash and unreasoning lose heart and become unbelievers, we have a right to ask to whom the allusion is directed. In the young, the forward, the men stigmatised by the Bengalee as rash and unreasoning we find no loss of courage or faith but only a hesitation on what lines to proceed now that the old means have been broken by repressive laws. Among the older men we do indeed find a spirit of depression for which we blame those who in the face of the repressions drew in their horns out of mature deliberation and allowed silence and inactivity to fall on the country. But these were never men of faith. We who believe in God's dispensations have not lost heart, we have not become unbelievers. Our cry is as loud as before for Swaraj and Swadeshi; our hearts beat as high.

Intuitive Reason.

However there is hope for our contemporary. He has admitted in his idea of rationality the place of the intuitive reason, and it is precisely the intuitive reason, speaking of-tenest in the present stage of human development through the inspiration that wells up from the heart, which is the basis of faith and exceeds the limits of the logical intellect. For this is the highest form of faith when the intuitive reason speaks to the heart, captures the emotions and is supported by reflection. This is the faith that moves mountains and there is nothing higher and more powerful except the yet deeper inner knowledge.

YOGA AND HYPNOTISM.

When the mind is entirely passive, then the force of Nature which works in the whole of animate and inanimate creation, has free play; for it is in reality this force which works in man as well as in the sun and star. There is no doubt of this truth whether in Hinduism or in Science. This is the thing called Nature, the sum of cosmic force and energy, which alone Science recognises as the source of all work and activity. This also is the Prakriti of the Hindus to which under different names Sankhya and Vedanta agree in assigning a similar position and function in the Universe. But the immediate question is whether this force can act in man independently of man's individual will and initiative. Must it always act through his volition or has it a power of independent operation? The first real proof which Science has had of the power of action independent of volition is in the phenomena of hypnotism. Unfortunately the nature of hypnotism has not been properly understood. It is supposed that by putting the subject to sleep the hypnotist is able in some mysterious and unexplained way to substitute his will for the subject's. In a certain sense all the subject's activities in the hypnotic state are the results of his own volition, but that volition is not spontaneous, it is used as a slave by the operator working through the medium of suggestion. Whatever the hypnotist suggests that the subject shall think, act or feel, he thinks, acts or feels, and whatever the hypnotist suggests that the subject shall become, he becomes. What is it that gives the operator this stupendous power? Why should the mere fact of a man passing into this sleep-condition suspend the ordinary reactions of mind and body and substitute others at the mere word of the man who has said to him, "Sleep"! It is sometimes supposed that it is the superior will of the hypnotist which overcomes the will of the other and makes it a slave. There are two strong objections to this view. It does not appear to be true that it is the weak and distracted will that is most easily hypnotised; on the contrary the strong concentrated mind forms a good subject. Secondly, if it were the operator's will using the will of the subject, then the results produced must be such as the latter could himself bring about, since the capacities of the instrument can not be exceeded by the power working through the instrument. Even if we suppose that the invading will brings with it its own force still the results produced must not exceed the sum of its capacity plus the capacity of the instrument. If they commonly do so, we must suppose that it is neither the will of the operator nor the will of the subject nor the sum of these two wills that is active, but some other and more potent force. This is precisely what we see in hypnotic performance. 19522.

What is this force that enables or compels a weak man to become so rigid that strong arms cannot bend him? that reverses the operations of the senses and abrogates pain? that changes the fixed character of a man in the shortest of periods? that is able to develop power where there was no power, moral strength where there was weakness, health where there was disease? that in its higher manifestations can exceed the barriers of space and time and produce that far-sight, far-hearing and far-thinking which shows mind to be an untrammelled agent or medium pervading the world and not limited to the body which it informs or seems to inform. The European scientist experimenting with hypnotism is handling forces which he cannot understand, stumbling on truths of which he cannot give a true account. His feet are faltering on the threshold of Yoga. It is held by some thinkers, and not unreasonably if we consider these phenomena, that mind is all and contains all. It is not the body which determines the operations of the mind, it is the mind which determines the laws of the body. It is the ordinary law of the body that if it is struck, pierced or roughly pressed it feels pain. This law is created by the mind which associates pain with these contacts, and if the mind changes its dharma and is able to associate with these contacts not pain but insensibility or pleasure, then they will bring about those results of insensibility or pleasure and no other. The pain and pleasure are not the result of the contact, neither is their seat in the body; they are the result of association and their seat is in the mind. Vinegar is sour, sugar sweet, but to the hypnotised mind vinegar can be sweet, sugar sour. The sourness or sweetness is not in the vinegar or sugar, but in the mind. The heart also is the subject of the mind. My emotions are like my physical feelings, the result of association, and my character is the result of accumulated past experiences with their resultant associations and reactions crystallizing into habits of mind and heart summed up in the word, character. These things like all the rest that are made of the stuff of associations are not permanent or binding but fluid and mutable. Anityah sarvasamskaraḥ. If my friend blames me, I am grieved; that is an association and not binding. The grief is not the result of the blame but of an association in the mind. I can change the association so far that blame will cause me no grief, praise no elation. I can entirely stop the reactions of joy and grief by the same force that created them. They are habits of the mind, nothing more. In the same way though with more difficulty I can stop the reactions of physical pain and pleasure so that nothing will hurt my body. If I am a coward today, I can be a hero tomorrow. The cowardice was merely the habit of associating certain things with pain and grief and of shrinking from the pain and grief; this shrinking and the physical sensations in the vital or nervous man which accompany it are called fear, and they can be dismissed by the action of the mind which created them. All these are propositions which European Science is even now unwilling to admit, yet it is being proved more and more by the phenomena of hypnotism that these effects can be temporarily at least produced by one man upon another; and it has even been proved that disease can be permanently cured or character permanently changed by the action of one mind upon another. The rest will be established in time by the development of hypnotism.

The difference between Yoga and hypnotism is that what hypnotism does for a man through the agency of another and in the sleeping state, Yoga does for him by his own agency and in the waking state. The hypnotic sleep is necessary in order to prevent the activity of the subject's mind full of old ideas and association, from interfering with the operator. In the waking state he would naturally refuse to experience sweetness in vinegar or sourness in sugar or to believe that he can change from disease to health, cowardice to heroism by a mere act of faith; his established associations would rebel violently and successfully against such contradictions of universal experience. The force which transcends matter would be hampered by the obstruction of ignorance and attachment to universal error. The hypnotic sleep does not make the mind a tabula rasa but it renders it passive to everything but the touch of the operator. Yoga similarly teaches passivity of the mind so that the will may act unhampered by the samskaras or old associations. It is these samskaras, the habits formed by experience in the body, heart or mind, that form the laws of our psychology. The associations of the mind are the stuff of which our life is made. They are more persistent in the body than in the mind and therefore harder to alter. They are more persistent in the race than in the individual; the conquest of the body and mind by the individual is comparatively easy and can be done in the space of a single life, but the same conquest by the race involves the development of ages. It is conceivable, however, that the practice of Yoga by a great number or men and persistence in the practice by their descendants might bring about profound changes in human psychology and, by stamping these changes into body and brain through heredity, evolve a superior race which would endure and by the law of the survival of the fittest eliminate the weaker kinds of humanity. Just as the rudimentary mind of the animal has been evolved into the fine instrument of the human being so the rudiments of higher force and faculty in the present race might evolve into the perfect buds of the Yogi.

According as is a man's fixed and complete belief, that he is,—not immediately always but sooner or later, by the law that makes the psychical tend inevitably to express itself in the material. The will is the agent by which all these changes are made and old sanskaras replaced by new, and the will cannot act without faith. The question then arises whether mind is the ultimate force or there is another which communicates with the outside world through the mind. Is the mind the agent or simply the instrument? If the mind be all, then it is only animals that can have the power to evolve; but this does not accord with the laws of the world as we know them. The tree evolves, the cloud evolves, everything evolves. Even in animals it is evident that mind is not all in the sense of being the ultimate expression of existence or the ultimate force in Nature. It seems to be all only because that which is all expresses itself in the mind and passes everything through it for the sake of manifestation. That which we call mind is a medium which pervades the world. Otherwise we could not have that instantaneous and electrical action of mind upon mind of which human experience is full and of which the new phenomena of hypnotism, telepathy etc are only fresh proofs. There must be contact, there must be interpenetration if we are to account for these phenomena on any reasonable theory. Mind therefore is held by the Hindus to be a species of subtle matter in which ideas are waves or ripples, and it is not limited by the physical body which it uses as an instrument. There is an ulterior force which works through this subtle medium called mind. An animal species develops according to the modern theory, under the subtle influence of the environment. The environment supplies a need and those who satisfy the need develop a new species which survives because it is more fit. This is not the result of any intellectual perception of the need nor of a resolve to develop the necessary changes, but of a desire, often though not always a mute, inarticulate and unthought desire. That desire attracts a force which satisfies it. What is that force? The tendency of the psychical desire to manifest in the material change is one term in the equation; the force which develops the change in response to the desire is another. We have a will beyond mind which dictates the change, we have a force beyond mind which effects it. According to Hindu philosophy the will is the Jiva, the Purusha, the self in the anandakosha acting through vijnanu, universal or transcendental mind; this is what we call spirit. The force is Prakriti or Shakti, the female principle in Nature which is at the root of all action. Behind both is the single Self of the universe which contains both Jiva and Prakriti, spirit and material energy. Yoga puts these ultimate existences within us in touch with each others and by stilling the activity of the sanskaras or associations in mind and body enable them to act swiftly, victoriously, and as the world calls it, miraculously. In reality there is no such thing as a miracle; there are only laws and processes which are not yet understood.

Yoga is therefore no dream, no illusion of mystics. It is known that we can alter the associations of mind and body temporarily and that the mind can alter the conditions of the body partially. Yoga asserts that these things can be done permanently and completely. For the body conquest of disease, pain and material obstructions, for the mind liberation from bondage to past experience and the heavier limitations of space and time, for the heart victory over sin and grief and fear, for the spirit unclouded bliss, strength and immutation, this is the gospel of Yoga. is the goal to which Hinduism points humanity.

EXIT BIBHISAN.

Mr. Gopal Krishna Gokhale has for long been the veiled prophet of Bombay. His course was so ambiguous, his sympathies so divided and self-contradictory that some have not hesitated to call him a masked Extremist. He has played with Boycott, "that criminal agitation;" he has gone so far in passive resistance as to advocate refusal of the payment of taxes. Eloquent spokesman of the people in the Legislative Council, luminous and ineffective debate: scattering his periods in vain in that august void, he has been at once the admired of the people and the spoilt darling of the Times of India, the trusted counsellor of John Morley and a leader of the party of Colonial self-government. For some time the victim of his own false step during the troubles in Poona he was distrusted by the people, favoured by the authorities, some of whom are said to have canvassed for him in the electoral fight between him and Mr. Tilak. The charge of cowardice which he now hurls against his opponents was fixed on his own forehead by popular resentment. So difficult was his position that he refrained for some years from speech on the platform of the Congress. But his star triumphed. His own opponents held out to him the hand of amity and re-established him in the universal confidence of the people. Gifted, though barren of creative originality, a shrewd critic, a splendid debater, a good economist and statistician, with the halo of self-sacrifice for the country over his forehead enringed with the more mundane halo of Legislative Councilorship, petted by the Government, loved by the people, he enjoyed a position almost unique in recent political life. He was not indeed a prophet honoured in his own country and baat looks and black words were thrown at him by those who distrusted him, but throughout the rest of India his name stood high and defied assailants.

In his recent speech at Poona the veiled prophet has unveiled himself. The leader of the people in this strange and attractive double figure is under sentence of elimination and the budding Indian Finance Minister has spoken. The speech has caused confusion and searching of the heart among the eager patriots of the Bengal Moderate school, rejoicing in the ranks of Anglo-India. The Bengalee labours to defend the popular cause without injuring the popular leader, the Statesman rejoices and holds up the speech even as Lord Morley held up the certificate to him as the Savior of India for the confusion of rebels in Parliament and outside it. Covered by a reprobation of the London murders it is a sweeping: a damning philippic against the work of the last four years and a call to the country to recede to the position occupied by us previous

 • 1905] It is a forcible justification of repression and a call to Government and people to crush the lovers and preachers of independence. The time at which it comes lends it incalculable significance. The Morleyan policy of crushing the new spirit and rallying the Moderates has now received publicly the imprimatur of the leading Moderate of western India and that which was suspected by some, prophesied by others at the time of the Surat Congress, the alliance of Bombay Moderatism with officialdom against the new Nationalism, an alliance prepared by the Surat sitting, cemented by subsequent events, confirmed by the Madras Convention, is now unmasked and publicly ratified.

The most odious part of the Poona speech is that in which Mr. Gokhale justifies Government repression and attempts to establish by argument what Mr. Norton failed to establish by evidence, the theory that Nationalism and Terrorism are essentially one and under the cloak of passive resistance. Nationalism is a conspiracy to wage war against the King. This proposition he seeks to establish by implication with that skill of the debater for which he is justly famous. By taking the London murders as the subject-matter for the exordium of a speech directed against the forward party he introduces the element of prejudice from the very outset. After reviewing past political activities he takes up the clue he had thus skilfully thrown down and pursues it. In his view, the ideal of independence was the beginning of all evil. The ideal of independence is an insane ideal; the men who hold it even as an ultimate goal, Tilak, Chidambaram, Aswini Kumar, Manoranjan, Bipinchandra, Aurobindo, are madmen outside the lunatic asylum. Not only is it an insane ideal, it is a criminal ideal. "It should be plain to the weakest understanding that towards the idea of independence the Government could adopt only one attitude, that of stern and relentless repression, for these ideas were bound to lead to violence and as a matter of fact they had, as they could all see, resulted in violence." Farther, in order to leave no loophole of escape for his political opponents, he proceeds to assert that they were well aware of this truth and preached the gospel of independence knowing that it was a gospel of violence and physical conflict with the Government." We again quote the words of the reported speech. "Some of their friends were in the habit of saying that their plan was to achieve independence by merely peaceful means, by a general resort to passive resistance. The speaker felt bound to say that such talk was ridiculous nonsense and was a mere cloak used by the means these men to save their own skins." In other words we are charged with having contemplated violence such as we all see, viz., the murders in London and the assassinations in Bengal, as inevitable effects of our propaganda, and physical conflict with the Government, in other words rebellion, as the only possible means of achieving independence. We are charged with preaching this gospel of violence and rebellion while publicly professing passive resistance, with the sole motive of cowardice anxiety for our personal safety. The accusation is emphatic, sweeping, and allows of no exception. All the men of the Nationalist party revered by the people are included in the anathema, branded as lunatics and cowards, and the country is called upon to denounce them as corruptors and perturbors of youth and the enemies of progress and the best interests of the people.

Mr. Gokhale stops short of finding fault with European countries for being free and clinging to their freedom. He is good enough not to uphold subjection as the best thing possible for a nation, and we must be grateful to him for stopping short of the gospel of the Englishman whose abusive style he has borrowed. But man is progressive and it may be that Mr. Gokhale before he finishes his prosperous career, will reach the Hare Street beatitudes. At present he adopts the philosophy of his ally and teacher, Lord Morley, and wraps himself in the Canadian fur-coat. The love of independence may be a virtue in Europe, it is crime and lunacy in India. Acquiescence in subjection is weakness and unmanliness in non-Indians; in this favoured country it is the only path to salvation. In the west the apostles of liberty have been prophets when they succeeded, martyrs when they failed. In this country they are corruptors and perturbors of youth, enemies of progress and their country. Mendicancy, euphemionally named co-operation, can bring about colonial self-government in India although there is no precedent in history, but passive resistance, although, when most imperfectly applied and hampered by terrorism from above and below, it gave the seed of free institutions to Russia, cannot bring about independence in India even if it be applied thoroughly and combined with self-help, because there is no precedent in history. As has often been pointed out by Nationalist writers, both mendicancy and self-help plus passive resistance are new methods in history; both are therefore experiments; but while mendicancy is an isolated experiment which has been fully tried, failed thoroughly and fallen into discredit; self-help and passive resistance are methods to which modern nations are more and more turning, but they have been as yet tried only slightly and locally. It must be admitted that in India, so tried, their only result so far has been the Morley reforms. But was it not Mr. Gokhale who to defend mendicancy declared that the book of history was not closed and why should not a new chapter be written? But the book, is only open to the sacred hands of the Bombay Moderate; to the Nationalist it seems to be closed. But according to Mr. Gokhale we ought in any case to acquiesce because England has not done so badly in India as she might have done. His argument is kin to the Anglo-Indian logic which calls open to be contented and loyal because England is not Russia and repression here is never so savage as repression there; as if a serf were asked to be contented with serfdom because his master is kind or else his whip does not lacerate so fiercely as the other master's next door. Mr. Gokhale cannot be ignorant that our ideal of independence has nothing to do with the badness or goodness of the present Government in its own kind. We object to the present system because it is a bureaucracy, always the most narrow and unprogressive kind of Government because it is composed of slaves, not Indians, and subject to alien control, and most essentially because rest based on a foreign will imposed from outside and not on the free choice and organic development of the nation.

We might go on to expose the other inconsistencies and sophistries of Mr. Gokhale's speech. We might well challenge the strangeness of a sweeping and general charge of cowardice against the nation's leaders proceeding from the "broken reed" of Poona. But we are more concerned with the significance of his attitude than with the hollowness of his arguments. Lord Morley the other day quoted Mr. Gokhale's eulogium of the Asquith Government, saviours of India from chaos, as a sufficient answer to the critics of deportation. There was some indignation against Lord Morley for his disingenuousness in suppressing Mr. Gokhale's condemnation of the deportations; but it now appears that the British statesman did not make the mistake of quoting Mr. Gokhale without being sure of the thoroughness of the latter's support. As if in answer to the critics of Lord Morley Mr. Gokhale hastens to justify the deportations by his emphatic approval of stern and relentless repression as the only possible attitude for the Government towards the ideal of independence even when its achievement is sought through peaceful means. Mr. Gokhale's phrase is bold and thorough; it includes every possible weapon of which the Government may avail itself in the future and every possible use of the weapons which it holds at present. On the strength of Mr. Gokhale's panegyric Lord Morley, mocked at Mr. Mackarness and his supporters as more Indian than the Indians. We may well quote him again and apply the same ridicule, the ridicule of the autocrat, to Mr. Beachcroft, the Alipur judge, who, acquitted an avowed apostate of the ideal of independence. Mr. Gokhale, at least, has become more English than the English. A British judge, certainly not in sympathy with Indian unrest, expressly admits the possibility of peaceful passive resistance and the blamelessness of the ideal of independence. A leader of Indian Liberalism denounces that ideal as necessarily insane and criminal and the advocates of passive resistance as lunatics and hypocrites; and calls for the denunciation of them as enemies of their country and their removal by stern and relentless repression. Such are the ironies of both cooperation. It is well that we should know who are our enemies even if they be of our own household. Till now many of us regarded Mr. Gokhale as a brother with whom we had our own private differences, but he has himself by calling for the official sword to exterminate us removed that error. He publishes himself now as the righteousness Bibhishan who, with the Sugrivas, Angads and Hanumans of Madras and Allahabad has gone to join the Avatar of Radical absolutism in the India Office, and ourselves as the Rakshasa to be destroyed by this new Holy Alliance. Even this formidable conjunction does not alarm us. At any rate Bibhishan has come out of Lanka, and Bibhishans are always more dangerous there than in the camp of the adversary.

TWO PICTURES

The modern Review and Prabasi are doing monthly a service to the country the importance of which cannot be exaggerated. The former review is at present the best conducted and the most full of valuable matter of any in India. But good as are the articles which fill the magazine from month to month, the whole sum of them is outweighed in value by the single page which gives us the reproduction of some work of art by a contemporary Indian painter. To the lover of beauty and the lover of his country every one of these delicately executed blocks is an event of importance in his life within. The Reviews by bringing these masterpieces to the thousands who have no opportunity of seeing the originals are restoring the sense of beauty and artistic emotion inborn in our race but almost blotted out by the long reign in our lives of the influence of Anglo-Saxon vulgarity and crude tasteless commercialism. The pictures belong usually to the new school of Bengali art, the only living and original school now developing among us and the last issues have each contained a picture—especially important not only by the intrinsic excellence of the work but by the perfect emergence of that soul of India which we attempted to characterise in an article in our second issue.

student of the Government School of Art, Calcutta, and represents Nadir Shah ordering a general massacre. It is not one of those pictures salient and imposing which leap at once at the eye and hold it. A first glance only shows three figures almost conventionally Indian in poses which also seem conventional. But as one looks again and again the soul of the picture begins suddenly to emerge, and one realises with a start of surprise that one is in the presence of a work of genius. The reason for this lies in the extraordinary restraint and simplicity which conceals the artist's strength and subtlety. The whole spirit and conception is Indian and it would be difficult to detect in the composition a single trace of foreign influence. The grace and perfection of the design and the distinctness and vigour of form which support it are not European; it is the Sarcenic sweetness and grace, the old Vedantic massiveness and power transformed by some new nameless element of harmony into something original and yet Indian. The careful and minute detail in the minutiae of the dresses, of the armour of the warrior seated on the right, of the flickering lines of the pillar on the left are inherited from an intellectual ancestry whose daily vision was accustomed to the rich decoration of Agra and Fatehpur Sikri or to the fullness and crowded detail which informed the massive work of the old Vedantic artists and builders, Hindu, Jain, and Buddhist. Another peculiarity is the fixity and stillness which, in spite of the Titanic life and promise of motion in the figure of Nadir, pervade the picture. A certain stiffness of design marks much of the old Hindu art, a stiffness courted by the artists perhaps in order that no insistence of material life in the figures might distract attention from the expression of the spirit within which was their main object. By some inspiration of genius the artist has transformed this conventional stiffness into a hint of rigidity which almost suggests the lines of stone. This stillness adds immensely to the effect of the picture. The petrified inaction of the three human beings contrasted with the expression of the faces and the formidable suggestion in the pose of their sworded figures affects us like the silence of murder crouching for his leap.

The central figure of Nadir Shah dominates his surroundings. It is from this centre that the suggestion of something terrible coming out of the silent group has started. The strong proud and regal figure is extraordinarily impressive, but it is the face and the arm that give the individuality. That bare arm and hand grasping the rigid upright scimitar are inhuman in their savage force and brutality; it is the hand, the fingers, one might almost say the talons of the human wild beast. This arm and hand have action, murder, empire in them; the whole history of Nadir is there expressed. The grip and gesture have already commenced the coming massacre and the whole body behind consents. The face corresponds in the hard firmness and strength of the nose, the brute cruelty of the mouth almost lost in the moustache and beard. But the eyes are the master-touch in this figure. They overcome us with surprise when we look at them, for these are not the eyes of the assassin, even the assassin upon the throne. The soul that looks out of these eyes is calm, aloof and thoughtful, yet terrible. Whatever order of massacre has issued from these lips, did not go forth, from an ordinary, energetic man of action moved by self-interest, rage or blood-thirst. The eyes are the eyes of a Yogin but a terrible Yogin; such might be the look of some adept of the left-hand ways, some mighty Kapalika lifted above pity and shrinking as above violence and wrath. Those eyes in that face, over that body, arm, hand seem to be that of one whose spirit is not affected by the actions of the body, whose natural part and organs are full of the destroying energy of Kali while the soul, the witness within, looks on at the sanguinary drama tranquil darkly approving but hardly interested. And then it dawns on one that this is not so much the Nadir of history unconsciously perhaps the artist has given a quiet but effective delineation of the Scourge of God, the man who is rather a force than a human being, the Asura with a mission who has come to do God's work of destruction and help on the evolution by carnage and ruin. The soul within is not that of a human being. Some powerful Yogin of a Lemurian race has incarnated in this body, one born when the simian might and strength of the manava had evolved into the perfection of the human form and brain with the animal still uneliminated, who having by tapasya and knowledge separated his soul from his nature has elected this reward that after long beatitude, praty punyakritam lokan ushitva nashwathih samath, he should reincarnate as a force of nature informed by a human soul and work out in a single life the savage strength of the outward self, taking upon himself the foreordained burden of empire and massacre.

From Nadir the coming carnage has passed into the seated warrior and looks out from his eyes at the receiver of the order. The gaze is contemplative but not inward like Nadir's, and it is human and indifferent envisaging massacre as part of the activities of the soldier with a matter-of-fact approval. The figure is almost a piece of sculpture, so perfect is the rigidity of arrested and expectant action. The straight strong sword over the shoulder has the same rigid preparedness. There is a certain defect in the unnatural pose and obese curve of the hand which is not justified by any similar detail or motive in the rest of the figure. We notice a similar motiveless strain in the position of Nadir's left arm, though here something is perhaps added to the force of the attitude. A standing figure receives the sanguinary command. The folded hands and the scimitar suspended in front are full of the spirit of ready obedience and there is an expression of pleasure, almost amusement which makes even this commonplace face terrible, for the decree dooming thousands is taken as lightly as if it were order for nautch or banquet. The three mighty swords by, a masterly effect of balanced design, fill with death and menace the terrace on which the men are seated. Behind those formidable figures is a part of the palace gracious with the simple and magical lines of Indo-Saracenic architecture and in the distance on the right from behind a mass of heavy impenetrable green a slender tapering tower rises into the peaceful quiet of Delhi.

On another page of the same review we have a picture by one of the greatest Masters of European Art, Raphael's vision of the Knight. the picture is full of that which Greece and Italy perfected as the aim of Art, beauty and such soul-expression ightens physical beauty. It is beauty that is expressed in the robust body and feminine face of the armed youth both full of an exquisite languour of sleep, in the sweet face, the voluptuous figure, the gracious pose of the temptress offering her delicate allurements of flowers, in the other's grave strong and benign countenance, the vigorous physique and open gesture of promise and aspiration extending a book and a fine slender sword, in the delicacy of the landscape behind and the tree under which the dreamer lies. There is suggestion but it is the suggestion of more and more beauty, there is harmony and relation but it is the harmony and relation of loveliness of landscape as a background to the loveliness of the nobly-grouped figures. There is an attempt to express spiritual meanings but it is by outward symbols only and not by making the outward expression a vehicle for something that comes from within and overpowers unpalpably. This is allegory, the other is the drawing and painting of the very self of things. Only in the delicate spiritual face of the Knight is there some approach to the Eastern spirit. This is one kind of art and a great art, but is the other less? Beauty for beauty's sake can never be the spirit of art in India, beauty we must seek and always beauty, but never lose sight of the end which India holds more important, the realisation of the Self in things. Europeans create out of the imagination. India has always sought to go deeper within and create out of the Power behind imagination, by passivity and plenary inspiration, in Yoga, from samadhi.

MADRAS CINCHONA.

The competition of Java continues to seriously affect the Cinchona industry in the Madras Presidency from which the exports of the bark are now less than a third of what they were five years ago. The following statistics of the export trade in recent years indicate forcibly the steady decline in the industry :—

Year.	Quantity. lbs.	Value Rs.
1907-08	473,300	1,08,187
1908-09	312,032	67,030

Average of 5 years

1900-07	1,055,249	2,66,429

The bulk of the Madras shipments go to the United Kingdom, where the market has been consistent in its demand for the Madras product.

THE RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION

Speech by E. Antonino Ghosn at Beirut.

(Annual meeting of Hottel People's Association.)

My friend, Pandit Gopalji Karyatirtha has somewhat shirked to-day his duty as it was set down for him in the programme and left it to me. I hope you will not mind if I depart a little from the suggestion he has made to me. I would like, instead of assuming the role of a preacher and telling you, your duties which you know well enough yourselves, to take, if you will allow me, a somewhat wider subject, not unconnected with it but of a wider range. In addressing you to-day I wish to say a few words about the general right of association especially as we have practised and are trying to practise it in India to-day. I choose this subject for two reasons, first, because it is germane to the nature of the meeting we are holding, and secondly, because we have seen arbitrary hands laid upon that right of association which is everywhere cherished as a sign and safeguard of liberty and means of development of a common life.

There are three rights which are particularly cherished by free nations. In a nation the sovereign powers of Government may be enjoyed by the few or the many, but there are three things to which the people in European countries cling, which they persistently claim and after which, if they have them not, they always aspire. These are first, the right of a free Press, secondly, the right of free public meeting, and, thirdly, the right of association. There is a particular reason why they cling to these three as inherent rights which they claim as sacred and with which authority has no right to interfere. The right of free speech ensures to the people the power which is the greatest means for self-development, and that is the power of spreading the idea. According to our philosophy it is the idea which is building up the world. It is the idea which expresses itself in matter and takes to itself bodies. This is true also in the life of humanity; it is true in politics, in the progress and life of a nation. It is the idea which shapes material institutions. It is the idea which builds up and destroys administrations and Governments. Therefore the idea is a mighty force, even when it has no physical power behind it, even when it is not equipped with means, even when it has not organised itself in institutions and associations. Even then the idea moves freely abroad through the minds of thousands of men and becomes a mighty force. It is a power which by the very fact of being impalpable assumes all the greater potency and produces all the more stupendous results. Therefore the right of free speech is cherished because it gives the free movement, it gives the nation that power which ensures its future development, which endures success in any struggle for national life. So long as it may be of modernism and the new world. It is true that the latter were not that far off. Even so, however, there was the idea of maintaining itself, and the instruments, objects of rational and good in developing world. It is concerned and established in permanent and victorious focus.

This right of free speech takes the form first of a free Press. It is the Press which on its paper wings carries the idea abroad from city to city, from provinces to provinces until a whole continent is bound together by the links of one common aspiration. The right of public meeting brings men together. That is another force. They meet together on a common ground, moved by a common impulse, and as they stand or sit together in their thousands, the force of the idea within moves them by the magnetism of crowds. It moves from one to another till the hidden shakti, the mighty force within, stirred by the words thrown out from the platform travels from heart to heart and masses of men are not only moved by a common feeling and common aspiration, but by the force of that magnetism prepared to act and fulfil the idea. Then comes the right of association, the third of these popular rights. Given the common aspiration, common idea, common enthusiasm and common wish to act, it gives the instrument which binds men to strive towards the common object by common and associated actions; the bonds of brother-hood grow, energy increases, the idea begins to materialize itself to work in practical affairs and that which was yesterday merely an idea, merely a word thrown out by the eloquence of the orator, becomes a question of practical politics. It becomes work for it begins to work and fulfil itself. Therefore the people prize these rights, consider them a valuable asset, cling to and cherish and will not easily sacrifice them. Therefore they resent the arbitrary interference which takes from them what they consider indispensable for the preparation of national life.

Association is the mightiest thing in humanity; it is the instrument by which humanity moves, it is the means by which it grows, it is the power by which it progresses towards its final development. There are three ideas which are of supreme moment to human life and have become the watch-words of humanity. Three words have the power of remoulding nations and Governments, liberty, equality and fraternity. These words

 ...of the eighteenth century etc. men because they point to the ultimate goal towards which human evolution are moving. This liberty to which we progress is liberation out of a state of bondage. We move from a state of bondage to an original liberty. This is what our own religion teaches. This is what our own philosophy suggests as the goal towards which we move, mukti or moksha. We are bound in the beginning by a lapse from pre-existent freedom. we strive to shake off the bonds. we move forward and forward until, we have achieved the ultimate emancipation, that utter freedom of the soul, of the body of the whole man, that utter freedom from all bondage towards which humanity is always aspiring. We in India have found a mighty freedom within ourselves, our brother-men in Europe have worked towards freedom without.
 We have been moving on parallel lines towards the same end. They have found out the way to external freedom. We have found out the way to internal freedom.
 We meet and give to each other what we have gained. We have learned from them to aspire after external as they will learn from us to aspire after external as they will learn from us to aspire after internal freedom.

Equality is the second term in the triple gospel. It is a thing which mankind has never accomplished. From inequality and through inequality we move, but it is to equality. Our religion, our philosophy set equality forward as the essential condition of emancipation. All religions send us this message in a different form but it is one message. Christianity says we are all brothers, children of one God. Mahomedanism says we are the subjects and servants of one Allah, we are all equal in the sight of God. Hinduism says there is one without a second. In the high and the low, in the Brahmin and the Sudra, in the saint and the sinner, there is one Narayana, one God and he is the soul of all men. Not until you have realised Him, known Narayana, in all, and the Brahmin and the Sudra, the high and the low, the saint and the sinner are equal in your eyes, then and not until then you have knowledge, you have freedom, until then you are bound and ignorant. The equality which Europe has got is external political equality. She is now trying to achieve social equality. Now a days their hard-earned political liberty is beginning to pall a little upon the people of Europe because they have found it does not give perfect wellbeing or happiness and it is barren of the sweetness of brother-hood. There is no fraternity in this liberty. It is merely a political liberty. They have not either the liberty within or the full equality or the fraternity. So they are turning a little from what they have and they say increasingly, "Let us have equality, let us have the second term of the gospel towards which we strive." Therefore socialism is growing in Europe. Europe is now trying to achieve external equality as the second term of the gospel of mankind, the univer-ideal. I have said that equality is an ideal even with us but we have not tried to achieve it without. Still we have learned from them to strive after political equality and in return for what they have given us we shall lead them to the secret of the equality within.

Again there is fraternity. It is the last term of the gospel. It is the most difficult to achieve, still it is a thing towards which all religions call and human aspirations rise. There is discord in life, but mankind yearns for peace and love. This is the reason why the gospels which preach brotherhood spread quickly and excite passionate attachment. This was the reason of the rapid spread of Christianity. This was the reason of Buddhism's rapid spread in this country and throughout Asia. This is the essence of humanitarianism, the modern gospel of love for mankind. None of us have achieved our ideals, but human society has always attempted an imperfect and limited fulfilment of it. It is the nature, the dharma of humanity that it should be unwilling to stand alone. Every man seeks the brotherhood of his fellow and we can only live by fraternity with others. Through all its differences and discords humanity is striving to become one.

In India in the ancient times we had many kinds of association, for our life was much more complex and developed than it became afterwards. We had our political associations, we had our commercial associations, our educational, our religious associations. As in Europe, so in India men united together for many interests and worked in association for common ideals. But by the inroads of invasion and calamity our life became broken and disintegrated. Still, though we lost much, we had our characteristic forms in which we strove to achieve that ideal of association and unity. In our society we had organised a common village life. It was a one and single village life in which every man felt himself to be something, a part of a single organism. We had the joint family by which we tried to establish the principle of association in our family life. We have not in our social developments followed the path which Europe has followed. We have never tended to break into scattered units. The principle of association, the attempt to organize brotherhood was dominant in our life. We had the organisation of caste of which nowadays we hear such bitter complaints. It had no doubt many and possibly inherent defects, but it was an attempt, however imperfect, to base society upon the principle of association, the principle of closely organising a common life founded on common ideas common feelings, common tendencies, a common moral discipline and sense of corporate honour. Then we had an institution which in its form was peculiar to India which helped to bind men together in close brotherhood who had a common guru or the initiation into a common religious fraternity. All these we had. Then the impact of Europe came upon us and one by one these institutions began to be broken. Our village life is a thing of the past. The village has lost its community it has lost its ideals, it has lost that mutual cordiality and binding together by an intimate common life which held it up and made its life sweet and wholesome. Everywhere we see in the village moral deterioration and material decay. Our joint family has been broken. We are scattering into broken units and brother no longer looks upon brother. There is no longer the bond of love which once held us together, because the old ties and habit of association are being broken up. Our caste has lost its reality. The life has gone from within it and it is no longer an institution which helps towards unity, a common life or any kind of brotherhood. For once the idea is broken, the ideal within which is the principle of life is impaired the form breaks up and nothing can keep it together. Therefore we find all these things perishing. ### SIR EDWARD BAKER ON THE LONDON MURDERS:-

At the meeting of the Bengal Legislative Council Mr. Das condemned the London murders. In this connection Sir Edward Baker said:-

"The words which have fallen from Mr. Das this morning on the subject of the recent murders in London will I trust find an echo in the hearts of all right-thinking men in Bengal. I will not detract from its impressiveness by adding any remarks of my own. Not only in this province, but also in many other parts of India, the press and public speakers alike have hastened to denounce this outrage as well as those others which preceded it. Some of those may have been less prominent in the public eye, but I doubt whether they were less insidious in their effects or less dangerous in the long run to public tranquillity. But, gentlemen, it has been pointed out that the time has come when something much more than denunciation is required. The time has come for action. It would be well if all those now present, and also all the great audience outside, were to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest the forcible pronouncement which was made on this subject a few days ago by Mr. Gokhale at Poona. He has laid down with perfect clearness the lines on which the people of India must act, if they desire to put a peremptory end to these ill-aimed atrocities whose only consequence must be the holding back of the national advancement of the country. They must not be content merely to talk. They must organise an active and universal campaign of co-operation with the Government. Parents and guardians must act. Those who hold the conduct of education in their hands must act. Above all the student community itself must act. These three classes comprehend between them the power of the present and the control of the coming generation. If they will act, and act together, they will wipe out, as with a sponge, all traces of that mischievous movement which might almost be classed with comic opera if it were not on occasion homicidal. But if they fail to use the peaceful weapon that lies ready to their hands, if they abdicate their authority in favour of a handful of young men of immature age, of imperfect or non-existent education and of undisciplined emotions, they may rest assured the solution will come none the less, but it will be neither painless nor peaceful but that in the application of the remedy there will be little room for nice discrimination between the innocent and the guilty.

WYLLIE MEMORIAL.

MADAN LAL IN COURT.

In the proceedings against Madan Lal the prosecution showed that the prisoner purchased a revolver in January and had since practised regularly at a revolver range. Madan Lal asserted that he was a patriot, working for the emancipation of the Motherland. He objected to the word "murderer," saying that the deed was perfectly justified. The English would have done the same if the Germans came to England. He characterised a witness, named Sinha, as a traitor to his country.

ANANDA MOYEE'S CASE.

Mr. Coutts, District Judge, took up to day the appeal case of Ananda Moyee against the acquittal of Police Inspector Wainwright, Pleader Gagan Ghose and her adopted son Gokul Das charged with dacoity, assault, housebreaking and trespass. Mr. Das, counsel, and Babu Ananda Chandra Rai appeared respectively for the appellant and the defence. His Honour held the order of the acquittal by the Magistrate illegal and ordered a fresh enquiry. In this case on the 12th July Mr. Dass, counsel, appeared in support of the rule. The Public Prosecutor on behalf of the Crown informed the Court that he was instructed not to oppose the rule. The Sessions Judge made the rule absolute and ordered further enquiry.

NASIK SEDITION.

The case in which Vaman Shridhar Barve, Jagirdar of Kothura, stands charged with publishing seditious leaflets in Tanul was again called on for hearing before Mr. Jackson, District Magistrate, Nasik. His Honour said he had received a telegram from Mr. Hardless, Expert in Handwriting in Calcutta, expressing his regret for unavoidable non-attendance and stating he would attend positively if the case be fixed for August 12th. His Honour also said that the Commission issued for the examination of the late postmaster of Tippekulum was returned unexecuted and added he should have to seriously consider whether he should keep the accused in custody any longer, pending completion of the prosecution case, as he had already been in custody for nearly two months. His Honour subsequently passed an order for the release of the accused on his own recognisance for Rs. 500 and on his furnishing two sureties for the same amount. The case was then adjourned to August 12th.

DEATH OF LORD RIPON.

The news of the death of Lord Ripon has been received with regret in India. The Chief events of his viceroyalty are—the termination of the Afghan war, the restoration of Mysore to its lawful owners, the repeal of the Vernacular Press Act, the establishment of the Local Self-Government, the appointment of an Education Commission, arrangements for the framing of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the taking off of the import duties on cotton goods, the re-establishment of the Department of Agriculture to guard the country against famine, proposal to give to the higher classes of Indian Judges a large amount of jurisdiction in case of offences committed by British-born subjects. His sympathy for the Indians made him unpopular with the Anglo-Indians and Mr. Buckland has recorded how "a conspiracy had been formed by a number of men in Calcutta, who had bound themselves, in the event of the Government adhering to their projected legislation (about the jurisdiction of Indian Judges), to overpower the sentries at Government House, put the Viceroy on board a steamer at Chandpal ghat, and send him to England via the Cape. The existence of this conspiracy was known to the Lieutenant-Governor, and to the responsible officer who subsequently gave me (Mr. Buckland) this information."

SIRDAR AJIT SINGH'S LECTURE.

Sirdar Ajit Singh delivered a lecture on the "cause of the rise and fall of nations" before a big gathering at the the Bradlugh Hall Lahore on the 11th instant. Ramahari, formerly Editor of the Allahabad "Swaraj," who was convicted of sedition, read some "patriotic" poems. The lecturer referred to the ancient and modern history of Italy and Greece and other countries and then dwelt at length on Sikh history and the sacrifice of the Gurus. Coming to the present times, he referred to the sacrifices made by Tilak and Arabinde. The road to the rise of nations does not lie through primrose path but is strewn with trouble, privation and sacrifice. He said that reformers should approach the hamlets where the real nation dwells, and strongly censured the attitude of the upper ten of the Indian society. He asked his hearers to be true Swadeshi and set up private arbitration courts and not to let a day pass without doing some work of the country. His brother, Kishan Singh released recently, was present. Lalchand Falak, poet of the defunct Bharatmata party, read some poems and the meeting ended with shouts of "Bande Mataram."

SWADESHI BANK IN BOMBAY:—

Great impetus was given to the swadeshi movement by the inauguration on the 8th July of a large Bank with a capital of one crore-divided into one lakh shares of one hundred rupees each. A subscription list was opened and within five hours, capital was subscribed six times over, three being applications for no less than six crores worth of shares. This phenomenal success in floating is due to Jainarayan Dani of perhaps India's greatest bankers Shival Motilal. Mr. Dani is the moving spirit of the new Bank which is composed of a most powerful directorate of prominent merchants. In the history of Indian banks, this is the first instance of a record of over subscriptions within a space of a few hours and Mr. Dani whose banking experience and influence among mercantile community is great, has earned public congratulations.

THE GOVERNMENT AND HIS SON.

The following has been sent to us for publication:—

From Babu Sukumar Mitra.
To Sir Harold Stuart, K. C. V.
O. Secretary, Home Department to the Government of India.

6, College Square,
Calcutta, 18th May, 1909.

Sir,

I beg to thank you for kindly allowing me to have an interview with my father Babu Krishna Kumar Mitra at Agra. But I found him living in an one-storied house, which is neither well-ventilated nor well-lighted and I have reasons to believe that he is always kept under lock and key except for half an hour or so in the morning and in the evening and it seemed to me that he has considerably lost flesh and looked decidedly the worse for his incarceration. If the Government kindly allow him a little more freedom, I shall be very thankful.

2. In this hot season, the inhabitants of U. P. even the poorest man, sleep in the open air as it is almost impossible to sleep inside a room. Will the Government kindly allow him to sleep in the open air at night, if he so desires?

3. The man who cooks for my father does not know how to prepare such food as Bengalis are in the habit of taking. Will the Government employ a cook who can prepare the food to which the Bengalis are accustomed?

4. Hearing that he has got to take food that is not according to his taste, I wanted to send him some fruits and condiments but the jail authorities informed me that he was under jail regulations and therefore they could not allow him those things. I beg that permission be given to us to send him from time to time such food and condiments as may be to his liking. I need not add that we shall send nothing except what is good and healthy for him.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your most obedient servant,
(Sd) SUKUMAR MITRA.

From H. G. Stokes Esqr. Additional Deputy Secretary of the Government of India.

To Babu Sukumar Mitra, 6, College Square, Calcutta.

Home Department Political.

Sir,

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 17th May, 1909 in which you complain (1) that your father is living in an one-storied house which is neither well-ventilated nor well-lighted; (2) that he is always kept under lock and key except for half an hour or so in the morning and in the evening; (3) that he has lost flesh and looked decidedly the worse for his incarceration when you visited him; and (4) that the servant who cooks for him does not know how to prepare food which Bengalis are in the habit of taking. You also make the following requests viz.— (1) that your father may be allowed more freedom. (2) that he may be allowed to sleep in the open air, if he so desires, (3) that a cook may be employed for him who can prepare food to which Bengalis are accustomed; and (4) that you may be given permission to send him food and condiment.

In reply I am to state with regard to the complaints made by you that the Superintendent of the Central Jail, Agra, who is an officer of the India Medical Service, and who was referred to in the matter, reports that your father is living in a large airy, well-ventilated and well-lighted barrack with a large central corridor; that he is allowed two hours exercise outside his barrack in the morning and an hour in the evening; that during day time there is ample room for exercise in the large central corridor of his barrack and that he is in good health being no thinner than when he was first admitted into the jail, while his weight, since his incarceration, has not appreciably varied.

3. As regards the request made by you I am to say that the Government of India see no reason to allow your father more freedom than he has at present, nor are they prepared to grant you permission to send him food and condiments. As regards a Bengali cook, the Government of India regret there is no suitable man available, but the cook who now prepares the prisoner's food provides him with a plain wholesome diet quite suitable for him. It is not possible to arrange for your father to sleep in the open air and the Superintendent of the Jail reports that the large corridor is quite well suited for sleeping as the open air. Moreover your father is provided with a Jost fan and a mosquito net.

4. The attention of the Government of India has been drawn to an interview published in the Bengalee of 20th May which purports to have been granted to you and in which you are represented as having given publicity to the foregoing complaints as to your father's treatment, with the addition that he is not allowed pen and ink. The latter statement is also incorrect. Your father is allowed the use of writing materials whenever he requires them.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your most obedient servant,
(Sd) H. G. Stokes.
Additional Deputy Secretary to the Government of India.

The following was published in the Statesman on June 22. The public will notice how its language is very much that of the Government of India's letter to Babu Sukumar Mitra, published above.

KRISHNA KUMAR MITRA.

NEWSPAPER STATEMENTS DENIED.

A well-informed correspondent writes:—Statements have appeared of late in several native newspapers regarding the treatment of the State prisoner, Babu Krishna Kumar Mitra. It has been alleged that the prisoner is confined in a place which is neither well lighted nor well ventilated, that he is kept under lock and key except for half an hour or so in the morning and the evening; that he has lost flesh and suffered in health owing to his incarceration and that he is not allowed pen and ink. All these statements are incorrect. The prisoner is living in a large airy, well-lighted and well ventilated barrack with a large central corridor. He is allowed two hours exercise out side his barrack in the morning and an hour in the evening, and during day time there is ample room for exercise in the large central corridor of the barrack. He is in good health, being no thinner than when he was first admitted into jail, while his weight since he entered the jail has not varied appreciably, the prisoner is always allowed the use of books and of writing materials whenever he requires them.

One newspaper stated that Babu K. K. Mitra had twice memorialised the Government, but had received no reply. This also is incorrect. The orders of the Government of India on both his memorials were duly communicated to him. The Government of India have received no complaints from Babu K. K. Mitra himself on the subject of his treatment.

MR. GOKHALE ON THE PRESENT SITUATION.

Under the auspices of the Deccan Sabha the Hon. Mr. Gokhale delivered to a crowded audience an address in Marathi on the present situation, the Hon. Mr. Dixit being in the chair.

CONDEMNATION OF RECENT OUTRAGE.

Mr. Gokhale began by expressing, in the strongest terms the horror and indignation with which the dreadful news of the assassination of Sir William Curzon-Wyke and Dr. Lalceba by an Indian student in London had been received. The foul deed, he said, had blackened the Indian name and they must hang down their heads in shame before the whole civilized world. Fortunately the rulers were men who generally knew how to keep their heads cool even in times of excitement; and Mr. Gokhale trusted that there would be no indiscriminate condemnation of Indian students in London owing to this wicked and detestable crime. During his last visit to England nothing struck him more or filled him with deeper anxiety and apprehension than the growth of wild anarchical opinions among a section of the Indian students residing in that country. It was an extremely small section, not more than forty or fifty at the outside, out of about seven hundred young men, but they generally took care to keep themselves in evidence and make themselves as thoroughly disagreeable as possible to those from whom they differed on all public occasions.

OUR GRAVE RESPONSIBILITY.

Now that things had culminated in this horrible and dastardly outrage, they must lose no time in recognising the grave responsibility resting on them as to the influences to which these young men were exposed in foreign countries. The Government was dealing with the question in its own way, but without the co-operation of the parents and guardians and the general public the Government could not effect much. It was an extremely difficult question and Mr. Gokhale proposed to deal with it as also with the other phases of the student problem separately on another occasion.

GROWTH OF POLITICAL AGITATION.

Turning next to the subject of his address Mr. Gokhale reviewed briefly the history of political agitation in this country which roughly was a growth of the last forty years. He pointed out how at the beginning of the last century British rule appeared to the people over the minutest part of India more as a deliverance from chronic disorder and misrule than as a foreign rule with its inevitable drawbacks. He also pointed out how the earlier efforts for an improvement of their political status had come principally from Englishmen themselves.

PRESENT POLITICAL IDEAS.

After discussing the hopes and the faith that lay behind the Congress movement of the last quarter of a century, the speaker came to the political ideas which at present were working in the minds of the people. These ideas, he said, could in the first instance be divided into two categories—those which aimed at independence and those which sought only such progress for the people as was achievable under British rule. Though a certain hankering after independence must have existed here and there in individual minds from the very commencement of the British rule in India, as a factor to be reckoned with has been a growth of the last four or five years only. They had their origin in the despair which over-spread the Indian mind towards the close of Lord Curzon's Viceroyalty, in the general feeling of protest against European domination which had sprung up, as recognized by European observers in recent years throughout the East. It must be admitted that these ideas partly owing to their natural attractiveness and partly owing to a lack of political discrimination and judgment among the people had spread rapidly in the country; and they have constituted to-day a serious obstacle in the path of the country's progress. No man, said Mr. Gokhale, could be so fallen as to think that there was any special merit in living under a foreign Government or that there were not humiliations—at times painful and bitter humiliations—inseparable from it, but it was not a question of abstract theories or of mere sentiment.

It was a question of what was practicable and what was in the best interests of the country in the present circumstances. They had to recognize two things: One was that considering the difficulties of the position, England had done very well in India; and the second was that there was no alternative to British rule not only now but for a long time to come, in view of their endless divisions, their feeble public spirit, their general lack of energy, and other grave defects of national character. Only mad men outside lunatic asylums could think or talk of independence. That same patriotism which, in other countries, had taken other forms, must lead them in their situation to work loyally with the British Government for the progress and prosperity of their country. It should be plain to the weakest understanding that towards the idea of independence the Government could adopt only one attitude—that of stern and relentless repression, for, these ideas were bound to lead to violence, and as a matter of fact, they had as they could all see resulted in violence.

RESORT TO PASSIVE RESISTANCE.

Some of their friends were in the habit of saying that their plan was to achieve independence by merely peaceful means—by a general resort to passive resistance. The speaker felt bound to say that such talk was ridiculous, nonsense and was a mere cloak used by these men to save their own skins. Independence never had been achieved in the history of the world and never would, except by force; and the British would as stated recently by Lord Curzon, spend their last shilling and sacrifice their last man before they would suffer their rule to be overthrown. Therefore, ideas of independence meant physical conflict with the government of the country, and that necessarily would leave no option to the Government except stern repression. They often said that the good faith of the Government was involved in carrying out the programme given to the people of this country in the Charter Act of 1833 and the Royal Proclamation of 1858. Had not the Government on the other side an equal right to say that the people of his country having accepted British rule and certain liberties having been conferred on them on the basis of that understanding, good faith required them not to harbour ideas directed against the very existence of that rule? However strenuous their exertions for winning large liberties or acquiring a larger share in the administration of the country, it was of the utmost importance that they should give no reasonable ground for the suspicion that what they desired was an end of British rule itself. Of course, sometimes the authorities entertained such suspicion unjustly or unreasonably and often in the past, thoroughly loyal and constitutional agitation had been regarded with great disfavour by them and attempts made to brand it as disloyal. On such occasions they had stood up against the authorities with clear conscience and gone their own way and they would do so again. But the spread of wild ideas paralysed them all.

even in loyal and constitutional work and the repression which it invited, restricted the liberties of all and made further progress for the country, which in the circumstances could only be a peaceful progress, impossible.

THE STUDENT POPULATION.

The worst harm done by this propaganda was that it had unsettled the minds of the student population of the country. Their susceptible nature and immature judgments rendered them readily accessible to such influences; and on all sides they saw evidences of the deplorable results that had ensued. The speaker, therefore, emphatically asserted that they must denounce those who spread such wild ideas in the country as enemies of their progress and their best interests.

PROGRESS ACHIEVABLE UNDER BRITISH RULE.

Passing on to the political progress achievable under British rule, Mr. Gokhale said that there was practically no limit to it. Such progress had to lie in two directions, first, a steady obliteration of distinctions on grounds of race between individual Englishmen and individual Indians, and secondly, a steady advance by the people of this country towards that form of Government which Englishmen enjoyed in other parts of the Empire. The progress in both these directions was bound to be slow and in the second even more slow than in the first. The justice of their claim as regarded the steady obliteration of race distinction had been recently admitted even by Lord Curzon,—the same Lord Curzon who in the plenitude of his power had sought to explain away the Queen's Proclamation in open Council. Mr. Sinha's appointment as Law member of the Government of India under the new Reform Scheme was a striking recognition of that claim, and though it has not removed all inequalities they must acknowledge with deep gratitude that a momentous step towards equality had been taken by Government.

OUR MAIN DIFFICULTIES.

As regards their advance towards the goal of what might be roughly termed Colonial Self-Government, it had been urged by critics that it was unwise and even mischievous to mention such a goal since it could not concern the present or the near future. The speaker however did not share that view. He thought it was most useful and most important that they should be able to say to their countrymen that in the fulness of time they could hope to attain under British rule a form of Government worthy of the self-respect and of the civilized communities. Moreover those who spoke of such a goal spoke of it not to suggest what their countrymen might immediately ask for or the Government could be expected to grant, but to keep before their minds an ideal of what they had to qualify themselves for. For, the whole question, after all, was a question of character and capacity and qualification.

THE CONCLUSION.

They must realise that their main difficulties were in themselves. The present Hindu-Mohammedan agitation had drawn the pointed attention of everybody to the absence of any real unity in the country and had shown how deep and wide the fissures were. Their average character and capacity would have to be considerably raised before they could hope to bear the responsibilities of any real measure of self-government. Mr. Gokhale in conclusion dwelt on the new prospect opened by the reform Scheme and pointed how they could employ themselves usefully in the service of their country in various directions. Such work must be inspired by real, deep, passionate love of their country and not by a mere hatred or impatience of the foreigner, to be enduringly useful. They should do such work honestly and patiently so they would be qualified to take the next step in the order of natural development.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Indiscretions of Sir Edward.

The speech of Sir Edward Baker in the Bengal Council last week was one of those indiscretions which statesmen occasionally commit and invariably repent, but which live in their results long after the immediate occasion has been forgotten. The speech is a mass of indiscretions from beginning to end. Its first error was to rise to the bait of Mr. Madhusudan Das' grotesquely violent speech on the London murders and assume a political significance in the act of the young man Dhingra. The theory of a conspiracy behind this act is, we believe, generally rejected in England. It is not supported by a scrap of evidence and is repudiated by the London police, a much more skilful detective body than any we have in India and, needless to say, much more reliable in the matter of scrupulousness and integrity. It is the opinion of the London police that the act was dictated by personal resentment and not by political motives. It is not enough to urge in answer that the young man who committed this ruthless act himself alleges political motives. His family insist that he is a sort of neurotic maniac, and it is a matter of common knowledge that natures so disturbed often 'catch at tendencies in the air to give a fictitious dignity and sensational interest to actions really dictated by the exaggerated feelings common to these nervous disorders. Madanlal Dhingra evidently considered that Sir William Curzon-Wyllie was his personal enemy trying to alienate his family and interfere with his personal freedom and dignity. To an ordinary man these ideas would not have occurred or, if they had occurred, would not have excited homicidal feelings. But in disturbed minds such exaggerated emotions and their resultant acts are only too common. Unless and until something fresh transpires, no one has a right to assume that the murder was a political assassination, much less the overt act of a political conspiracy. Anglo-Indian papers of the virulent type whose utterances are distorted by fear and hatred of Indian aspirations, may assume that of which there is no proof,—nothing better can be expected of them. But for the ruler of a province not only to make the assumption publicly but to base upon it a threat of an unprecedented character against a whole nation is an indiscretion which passes measure.

The demand for co-operation.

The second crying indiscretion in Sir Edward's speech is the extraordinary demand for co-operation which he makes upon the people of this country. It is natural that a Government should desire co-operation on the part of the people and under normal circumstances it is not necessary to ask for it; it is spontaneously given. The circumstances in India are not normal. When a Government expects co-operation, it is because it either represents the nation or is in the habit of consulting its wishes. The Government in India does not represent the nation, and in Bengal at least it has distinctly set itself against its wishes. It has driven the Partition through against the most passionate and universal agitation the country has ever witnessed. It has set itself to baffle the Swadeshi-Boycott agitation. It has adopted against that movement all but the ultimate measures of repression. Nine deportations including in their scope several of the most respected and blameless leaders of the people stand to their debit account unredressed. Even in giving the new reforms, inconclusive and in some of their circumstances detrimental to the best interests of the country, it has been anxious to let it be known that it is not yielding to the wishes of the people but acting of its own autocratic motion. Against such a policy and principle of administration the people of this country have no remedy except the refusal of co-operation and even that has been done only within the smallest limits possible. Under such circumstances it is indeed a grotesque attitude for the ruler of Bengal to get up from his seat in the Council and not only request co-operation but demand it on pain of indiscriminate penalties such as only an autocratic government can inflict on the people under its control, and this with the full understanding that none of the grievances of the people are to be redressed. The meaning of co-operation is not passive obedience, it implies that the Government shall rule according to the wishes of the people and the people work in unison with the Government for the maintenance of their common interests. By advancing the demand in the way he has advanced it, Sir Edward Baker, has made the position of his Government worse and not better.

What co-operation?

The delusion under which the Government labours that the Terrorist activities have a great organisation at their back, is the source of its most fatal mistakes. Everyone who knows anything of this country is aware that this theory is a fabrication. If it were a fact, the conspiracy would by this time have been exposed and destroyed. The assassinations have in all instances, except the yet doubtful Maniktola conspiracy now under judicial consideration, been the act of isolated individuals, and even in the Maniktola instance, if we accept the finding of the Sessions Court, it has been shown by judicial investigation that the group of young men was small and so secret in their operations that only a few even of those who lived in their headquarters knew anything of the contemplated terrorism. Under such circumstances we fail to see either any justification for so passionate a call for co-operation or any possibility of an answer from the public. All that the public can do is to express disapprobation of the methods used by these isolated youths. It cannot turn itself into a huge Criminal Investigation Department to ferret out the half dozen men here and there who possibly contemplate assassination and leave its other occupations and duties after the pattern of the police who in many quarters are so busy with suppressing fancied Swadeshi outrages that real outrage and disloyalty go unpunished. We do not suppose that Sir Edward Baker himself would make such a demand, but if he has any other co-operation in view it would be well if he would define it before he proceeds with his strenuous proposal to strike out right and left at the innocent and the guilty without discrimination. On the other hand the Anglo-Indian papers are at no loss for the definite method of cooperation which they demand from the country on peril of "stern and relentless repression." They demand that we shall cease to practise or to preach patriotism and patriotic self-sacrifice and submit unconditionally to the eternally unalterable absolutism which is the only system of government Lord Morley will tolerate in India. That demand has only to be mentioned to be scouted.

Sir Edward's Menace.

The final indiscretion of Sir Edward Baker was also the worst. We do not think we have ever heard before of an official in Sir Edward's responsible position uttering such a menace as issued from the head of this province on an occasion and in a place where his responsibility should have been specially remembered. We have heard of autocrats threatening contumacious opponents with condign punishment, but even an autocrat of the fiercest and most absolute kind does not threaten the people with the punishment of the innocent. The thing is done habitually—in Russia; it has been done recently in Bengal; but it is always on the supposition that the man punished is guilty. Even in the deportations the Government has been eager to impress the world with the idea that although it is unable to face a court of justice with the "information, not evidence" which is its excuse, it had ample grounds for its belief in the guilt of the deportees. Sir Edward Baker is the first ruler to declare with cynical openness that if he is not gratified in his demands, he will not care whether he strikes the innocent or the guilty. By doing so he has dealt an almost fatal blow at the prestige of the Government. If this novel principle of administration is applied, in what will the government that terrorises from above be superior to the dynamiter who terrorises from below? Will not this be the negation of all law, justice and government? Does it not mean the reign of lawless force and that worst consummation of all, Anarchy from above struggling with Anarchy from below? The Government which denies the first principle of settled society, not only sanctions but introduces anarchy. It is thus that established authority creates violent revolutions. They abolish by persecution all the forces, leaders, advocates of peaceful and rapid progress and by their own will set themselves face to face with an enemy who cannot so be abolished. Terrorism thrives on administrative violence and injustice; that is the only atmosphere in which it can thrive and grow. It sometimes follows the example of indiscriminate violence from above; it sometimes, though very rarely, sets it from below. But the power above which follows the example from below is on the way to committing suicide. It has consented to the abrogation of the one principle which is the lifebreath of settled governments.

The Personal result.

Sir Edward Baker came into office with the reputation of a liberal ruler anxious to appease unrest. Till now he has maintained it in spite of the ominous pronouncement he made, when introducing measures of repression, about the insufficiency of the weapons with which the Government was arming itself. But by his latest pronouncement, contradicting as it does the first principles not only of Liberalism but of all wise Conservatism all over the world, he has gone far to justify those who were doubtful of his genuine sympathy with the people. Probably he did not himself realize what a wound he was giving to his own reputation and with it to his chances of carrying any portion of the people with him.

A one-sided proposal.

A writer in the Indian World has been holding out the olive branch to the advanced Nationalist party and inviting them into the fold of the body which now calls itself the Congress. The terms of this desirable conciliation seem to us a little peculiar. The Nationalists are to give up all their contentions and in return the Bombay coterie may possibly give up their personal dislike of working with the Nationalist leaders. This is gracious but a little unconvincing. The only difficulty the mediator sees in the way is the constitutional point raised by a section of the Moderates against the arbitrary action of the Committee of the Convention in passing a constitution and forcing it on the delegates without submission to freely elected delegates sitting in a session of the Congress itself. The mediator proposes to get round the objection by the Bombay coterie agreeing to pass the Constitution en bloc through the Congress provided an undertaking is given by the Nationalists that they will accept bodily the whole of the constitution and make no opposition to any of its provisions! A very remarkable proviso! The writer assumes that the Nationalists have accepted the Constitution bodily and are willing to sign the creed. We think he is in error in his assumptions. The Nationalists are not likely to give any undertaking which will abrogate their constitutional right to make their own proposals about the Constitution at the beginning or to suggest amendments to it hereafter. They will sign no creed, as it is against their principles to make the Congress a sectional body and they refuse to bind themselves to regard colonial self-government as the ultimate goal of our national development. Whatever resolutions are passed by a properly constituted Congress they will accept as the temporary opinion of the majority while reserving the right, which all minorities reserve, of preaching their own convictions. They refuse to regard the Madras Convention or the contemplated Lahore Convention as a sitting of the Congress or its resolutions as the will of the country. The position taken, that the Bombay coterie are in possession of the Congress and it is theirs to admit Nationalists or not at their pleasure is one we cannot recognize. If there is to be an united Congress it must resume its life at the point where the Calcutta session broke off. All that has happened in between is a time of interregnum.

The only Remedy.

The attempt to reunite the parties on such lines is foredoomed to failure. Nor is it likely that even if the Nationalists were entirely accommodating there would be any change of opinion. The attitude of Mr. Gokhale is unchangeable on this point. Not only has he completely separated himself and his school from the advocates of passive and passive resistance but he has denounced them as enemies of the country and handed them over to the "stern and relentless repression" of the authorities. The Tribune calls on Bengal to give up the boycott on the ground that it is no longer sanctioned by the "Congress" as it chooses to call a body which even the whole of the Moderate party were unable to join. The only remedy for the situation is for those who desire unity to rebuild the National Assembly from the bottom on the basis of provincial unity and abstention from any mutilated body Moderate or Nationalist, however august the name under which it masks its unrepresentative character, so long as it professes to speak for the nation and yet refuses to admit freely its elected representatives.

The Bengalee and Ourselves

The Bengalee has answered our facts and opinions with its facts and comments. Unfortunately we find in our contemporary's answer all comment and no fact. For the most part he is busy trying to prove that we were really inconsistent and contradictory, or, if he misunderstood us, it was due to our uninstructed use of language. In the first place we did not expressly say that we saw God in every thing and only specially in special movements. Of course we did not. As we pointed out we could not be always guarding ourselves against gratuitous misconceptions, and the omnipresence of God is such an obvious fact that it has not to be expressly stated. It is curious that our contemporary's powerful intelligence seems still unable to grasp the point about leadership. If the movement were the result of human calculation or guided by human calculation, or even if every constructive step were the result of mature deliberation, there would be no point in insisting that the movement was created and led (we beg pardon, we mean specially created and led,) by God and not by human wisdom. We pointed out that none of these statements could be advanced in the face of the facts, and our contemporary has not been able to meet our arguments; he has simply restated his previous unsupported assumption. Secondly, we were unfortunate enough to use in one place the word "His" where our contemporary thinks we should have used the word "that." With all submission we think our language was perfectly clear. We said His purpose and we meant His purpose, the purpose of raising up India. Then again we were unfortunate enough to indulge in an ironical repetition of our contemporary's phrase "mere" faith, with in commas inverted and our contemporary with portentous seriousness insists on taking this as our own epithet and seriously meant. We have pointed out that in our idea of faith it includes the logical analysing reason, it includes experience and exceeds it. It exceeds logical reason because it uses the higher intuitive reason; it exceeds experience because experience often gives the balance of its support to one conclusion where faith using intuition inclines to the opposite conclusion.

God and Man.

Our contemporary does not understand why we wrote of God and the universal force or why we insisted on the special manifestation of the divine force as opposed to its veiled workings through human egoism. We did so because we had to oppose the excess of that very egoism. We have not risen to the heights of Monism from which he scoffs benignly at our dualism. It may be the final truth that there is nothing but God, but for the purposes of life we have to recognise that there is a dualism in the underlying unity. It profits nothing to say, for instance, "The Divine Force wrote two columns of Facts and Comments the other day in the Bengalee." God reveals Himself not only in the individual where He is veiled by ignorance and egoism, but in Himself. When the Bengalee sees no alternative to man's selfconscious action except unconscious action, it is under the influence of the European materialism which sees only conscious creatures in an unconscious inanimate Nature. The Divine Force is not unconscious but conscious and intelligent and to see Him as a conscious power only in men is to deny Him altogether. When again our contemporary uses a misapplication of the truth of Adwaita to justify the deifying of his own reason, he is encouraging practical atheism while taking the divine name in vain. God manifests Himself in everything. He manifests himself in our reason, therefore let us forget God and rely on our own human calculations. That is the train of argument. What is the use of relying on God? let us look to our own safety. What is the use of being brave in the hour of peril? If our leader goes, the movement stops. Matra anusmara yulhya cha, is the motto of the Karmayogin. God manifests himself in the individual partially, but He stands behind the progress of the world wholly. We are bound to use our own intellects, we cannot help it if we would, but we must remember that it is a limited intellect and be prepared for the failure of our schemes and plans, for calamity, for defeat, without making these things an excuse for abandoning His work, laying our principles on the shelf or sending out a cry to discourage steadfastness and self-sacrifice. Our plans may fail, God's purpose cannot. That is why we laid so much stress on the fact that this has been a movement which, as the man in the street would say, has led itself, in which individuals have been instruments and not the real shapers and leaders. We have faith and we believe in the great rule of life in the Gita, "Remember me and fight." We believe in the mighty word of assurance to the bhakta, Macchittah sarva durgani matprasadat tarishyasi, "If thou reposest thy heart and mind in Me by My grace thou shalt pass safe through all difficulties and dangers. We believe that the Yoga of the Gita will play a large part in the uplifting of the nation, and this attitude is the first condition of the Yoga of the Gita. When anybody tries to discourage our people in this attitude, we are bound to enter the lists against him. We recognise that to argue with those who have only opinions but no realisation is a hopeless task, since it is only by entering into communion with the Infinite and seeing the Divine Force in all that one can be intellectually sure of its conscious action. But at least we can try to remove the philosophical delusions and confusions which mislead men from the right path and veil European materialism under generalities drawn from Vedanta.

THE GREATNESS OF THE INDIVIDUAL.

In all movements, in every great mass of human action it is the spirit of the Time, that which Europe calls the Zeitgeist and India Kala, who expresses himself. The very names are deeply significant. Kali, the Mother of all and destroyer of all, is the Shakti that works in secret in the heart of humanity manifesting herself in the perpetual surge of men, institutions and movements, Mahakala the Spirit within whose energy goes abroad in her and moulds the progress of the world and the destiny of the nations. His is the impetus which fulfils itself in Time, and once there is movement, impetus from the Spirit within, Time and the Mother take charge of it, prepare, ripen and fulfil. When the Zeitgeist, God in Time, moves in a settled direction, then the whole forces of the world are called in to swell the established current towards the purpose decreed. That which consciously helps, swells it, but that which hinders swells it still more, and like a wave on the windswept Ocean, now rising now falling, now high on the crest of victory and increase, now down in the troughs of discouragement and defeat the impulse from the hidden Source sweeps onward to its pre-ordained fulfilment. Man may help or man may resist, but the Zeitgeist works, shapes, overbears, insists.

The great and memorable vision of Kurukshetra when Sri Krishna manifesting his world-form declared himself as destroying Time, is significant of this deep perception of humanity. When Arjun wished to cast aside his bow and quiver, when he said, "This is a sin we do and a great destruction of men and brothers, I will forbear," Sri Krishna after convincing his intellect of error, proceeded by that marvellous vision described in the eleventh canto of the Gita to stamp the truth of things upon his imagination. Thus run the mighty stanzas:

लोकान् समहरन्मिह प्रवृत्तः । कतमपि त्वां न भविष्यति सर्वं येऽवस्थिताः प्रतरन्तीकु योधाः ॥ तस्मात्सुखिष्ठ यमो वभक्ष क्षित्वा यद्वृन्मुहुः, राज्यं सद्यः । मयैवैते निहतः पूर्वमेव निमित्तमात्रं भवं संवराणि ॥

"I am time who waste and destroy the people; Lo, I have arisen in my might, I am here to swallow up the nations. Even without thee all they shall not be, the men of war who stand arrayed in the opposing squadrons. Therefore do thou arise and get thee great glory, conquer thy foes and enjoy a great and wealthy empire. For these, they were slain even before and it is I who have slain them; be the occasion only, O Savyasachin."

It is not as the slow process of Time that Sri Krishna manifests himself; it is as the Zeitgeist consummating in a moment the work carefully prepared for decades that He appears to Arjuna. All have been moving inevitably towards the catastrophe of Kurukshetra. Men did not know it: those who would have done everything possible to avert the calamity, helped its coming by their action or inaction; those who had a glimpse of it strove in vain to stop the wheels of Fate; Sri Krishna himself as the nishkama karmayogin who does his duty without regard to results, went on that hopeless embassy to Hastinapura; but the Zeitgeist overbore all. It was only afterwards that men saw how like rivers speeding towards the sea, like moths winging towards the lighted flame all that splendid powerful and arrogant Indian world with its clans of Kings and its weapons and its chariots and its gigantic armies were rushing towards the open mouths of the destroyer to be lost in His mighty jaws, to be mangled between His gnashing teeth. In the lila of the Eternal there are movements that are terrible as well as movements that are sweet and beautiful. The dance of Brindaban is not complete without the death-dance of Kurukshetra; for each is a part of that great harmonic movement of the world which progresses from discord to accord, from hatred and strife to love and brotherhood, from evil to the fulfilment of the evolution by the transformation of suffering and sin into beauty, bliss and good, shivam, shantam, suddham, anandam.

Who could resist the purpose of the Zeitgeist? There were strong men in India then by the hundred, great philosophers and Yogins, subtle statesmen, leaders of men, kings of thought and action, the efflorescence of a mighty intellectual civilisation at its height. A little turning to the right instead of to the left on the part of a few of these would, it might seem, have averted the whole catastrophe. So Arjun thought when he flung aside his bow. He was the whole hope of the Pandavas and without him their victory must seem a mere dream and to fight an act of madness. Yet it is to him that the Zeitgeist proclaims the utter helplessness of the mightiest and the sure fulfilment of God's decree. "Even without thee all they shall not be, the men of war who stand arrayed in the opposing squadrons." For these men are only alive in the body; in that which stands behind and fulfils itself they are dead men. Whom God protects who shall slay? Whom God has slain who shall protect? The man who slays is only the occasion, the instrument by which the thing done behind the veil becomes the thing done on this side of it. That which was true of the great slaying at Kurukshetra is true of all things that are done in this world, of all the creation, destruction and preservation that make up the lila.

The greatness of this teaching is for the great. Those who are commissioned to bring about mighty changes are full of the force of the Zeitgeist. Kali has entered into them and Kali when she enters into a man cares nothing for rationality and possibility. She is the force of Nature that whirls the stars in their orbits, lightly as a child might swing a ball, and to that force there is nothing impossible. She is aghatana-ghatana-patiyusi, very skilful in bringing about the impossible. She is the devatmashakti svaguneir nigudha, the Power of the Divine Spirit hidden in the modes of its own workings, and she needs nothing but time to carry out the purpose with which she is commissioned. She moves in Time and the very movement fulfils itself, creates its means, accomplishes its ends. It is not an accident that she works in one man more than in another. He is chosen because he is a likely vessel, and having chosen him she neither rejects him till the purpose is fulfilled nor allows him to reject her. Therefore Srikrishna tells Arjun.

निवेद्य वाचसायसो ब्रह्मतिष्ठन् निवेद्यति

"The thought which thou thinkest and takest refuge in egoism saying 'I will not fight,' this thy resolve is a vain thing; Nature will yoke thee to thy work." When a man ~~seems to~~ have rejected his work, it ~~seems~~ means that his work is over and Kali leaves him for another. When a man who has carried out a great work is destroyed, it is for the egoism by which he has misused the force within that the force itself breaks him to pieces, as it broke Napoleon. Some instruments are treasured up, some are flung aside and shattered, but all are instruments. This is the greatness of great men, not that by their own strength they can determine great events, but that they are serviceable and specially-forged instruments of the Power which determines them. Mirabeau helped to create the French Revolution, no man more. When he set himself against it and strove, becoming a prop of monarchy, to hold back the wheel, did the French Revolution stop for the backsliding of France's mightiest? Kali put her foot on Mirabeau and he disappeared; but the Revolution went on, for the Revolution was the manifestation of the Zeitgeist, the Revolution was the will of God.

So it is always. The men who prided themselves that great events were their work, because they seemed to have an initial hand in them, go down into the trench of Time and others march forward over their shattered reputations. Those who are swept forward by Kali within them and make no terms with Fate, they alone survive. The greatness of individuals is the greatness of the eternal Energy within.

THE DOCTRINE OF SACRIFICE.

The genius of self-sacrifice is not common to all nations and to all individuals; it is rare and precious, it is the flowering of mankind's ethical growth, the evidence of our gradual rise from the self-regarding animal to the selfless divinity. A man capable of self-sacrifice, whatever his other sins, has left the animal behind him: he has the stuff in him of a future and higher humanity. A nation capable of a national act of self-sacrifice ensures its future.

Self-sacrifice involuntary or veiled by forms of selfishness is, however, the condition of our existence. It has been a gradual growth in humanity. The first sacrifices are always selfish—they involve the sacrifice of others for one's own advancement. The first step forward is taken by the instinct of animal love in the mother who is ready to sacrifice her life for the young, by the instinct of protection in the male who is ready to sacrifice his life for his mate. The growth of this instinct is the sign of an enlargement in the conception of the self. So long as there is identification of self only with one's own body and its desires the state of the jiva is unprogressive and animal. It is only when the self enlarges to include the mate and the children that advancement becomes possible. This is the first human state but the animal lingers in it in the view of the wife and children as chattels and possessions meant for one's own pleasure, strength, dignity, comfort. The family even so viewed becomes the basis of civilisation because it makes social life possible. But the real development of the god in man does not begin until the family becomes so much dearer than the life of the body that a man is ready to sacrifice himself for it, and give up his ease or even his life for its welfare or its protection. To give up one's ease for the family, that is a state which most men have attained; to give up one's life for the honour of the wife or the safety of the home is an act of a higher nature of which man is capable in individuals, in classes, but not in the mass. Beyond the family comes the community and the next step in the enlargement of the self is when the identification with the self in the body and the self in the family gives way to the identification with the self in the community. To recognize that the community has a larger claim on a man than his family is the first condition of the advance to the social condition. It corresponds to the growth of the tribe out of the patriarchal family and to the perfection of those communal institutions of which our village community was a type. Here again, to be always prepared to sacrifice the family interest to the larger interest of the community must be the first condition of communal life and to give one's life for the safety of the community the act of divinity which marks the consummation of the enlarging self in the communal idea. The next enlargement is to the self in the nation. The evolution of the nation is the growth which is most important now to humanity because human selfishness, family selfishness, class selfishness having still deep roots in the past must learn to efface themselves in the larger national self in order that the God in humanity may grow. Therefore it is that Nationalism is the dharma of the age, and God reveals himself to us in our common Mother. The first attempts to form a nationality were the Greek city, the Semetic or Mongolian monarchy, the Celtic clan, the Aryan kula or jati. It was the mixture of all these ideas which went to the formation of the mediaeval nation and evolved the modern peoples. Here again, it is the readiness to sacrifice self-interest, family interest, class interest to the larger national interest which is the condition of humanity's fulfilment in the nation and to die for its welfare or safety is the supreme act of self-consummation in the larger national ego. There is a yet higher fulfilment for which only a few individuals have shown themselves ready, the enlargement of the self to include all humanity. A step forward has been taken in this direction by the self-immolation of a few to humanitarian ideals, but to sacrifice their interests of the nation to the larger interests of humanity is an act of which humanity in the mass is not yet capable. God prepares, but He does not hasten the ripening of the fruit before its season. A time will come when this also will be possible, but the time is not yet. Nor would it be well for humanity if it came before the other and lesser identification were complete; for that would necessitate retrogression in order to secure the step which has been omitted. The advance of humanity is a steady progress and there is no great gain in rushing positions far ahead, while important points in the rear are uncaptured.

The national ego may easily mean nothing more than collective selfishness. I may be ready to sacrifice money and ease for the country in order to secure my wealth, fame, or position and property which depend upon her security and greatness. I may be ready to sacrifice these and more for her because of the safety of the home and the hearth which her safety ensures. I may be ready to sacrifice much for her because her greatness, wealth, ease mean the greatness, wealth, ease of my community or my class. Or I may be ready to sacrifice everything to secure her greatness because of my pride in her and my desire to see my nation dominant and imperial. All these are forms of selfishness pursuing man into the wider life which is meant to assist in liberating him from selfishness. The curse of capitalism, the curse of Imperialism which afflict modern nations are due to this insistence. It is the source of that pride, insolence and injustice which affect a nation in its prosperity and by that fatal progression which the Greeks with their acute sense for those things so clearly demarcated, it leads from prosperity to insolence and outrage and from insolence and outrage to that ate, that blind infatuation, which is God's instrument for the destruction of men and nations. There is only one remedy for this pursuing evil and it is to regard the nation as a necessary unit but no more in a common humanity.

There are two stages in the life of a nation, first, when it is forming itself or new-forming itself, secondly, when it is formed, organised and powerful. The first is the stage when Nationalism makes rightly its greatest demands on the individual, in the second it should abate its demands and having satisfied should persevere itself in Cosmopolitanism somewhat as the individual preserves itself in the family, the family in the class, the class in the nation, not destroying itself needlessly but recognising a larger interest. In the struggles of a subject nation to realise its separate existence, the larger interest can only be viewed in prospect and as a higher inspiration to a broadminded and generous patriotism. No sacrifice of the nation to the larger interest is possible, for the nation must exist before it can sacrifice its interests for a higher good.

We are at present in the first or formative stage, and in this stage the demand of Nationalism is imperative. It is only by the sacrifices of the individual, the family and the class to the supreme object of building up the nation that under such adverse circumstances Nationalism can secure the first conditions for its existence. Every act of the new Nationalism has been a call for suffering and self-sacrifice. Swadeshi was such a call, arbitration was such a call, national education was such a call, above all, passive resistance was such a call. None of these things can be secured except by a general readiness to sacrifice the individual and the family to the interests of the nation. Nowadays a new call is visibly forming, the call on the higher classes to sacrifice their privileges and prejudices, as the Japanese Samurai did, for the raising up of the lower. The spread of a general spirit of ungrudging self-sacrifice is the indispensable prelude to the creation of the Indian nation. This truth is not only evident from the very nature of the movement we have initiated, but it is borne out by the tests of history and experience to which we have been recently asked to refer in each individual case before the act of sacrifice is decided. It is by the appeal to history and experience that the Nationalist party has convinced the intellect just as by its inspiring ideals and readiness to suffer it has carried with it the heart of the nation. The demand that we should in every individual case go into a review of the whole question is excessive and impossible. It is enough if we are generally convinced of the utility and necessity of sacrifice and feel the individual call. It must be remembered that we cannot argue from the condition of a people formed, free and prospering to that of a people subject, struggling and miserable. In the first case the individual is not called to frequent acts of self-sacrifice but only to those regularly demanded by the nation and to a general readiness for especial sacrifice in case of necessity, but in the second the necessity is a constant quantity. Nor is it a sound principle to demand in such circumstances an adequate value for every individual act of courage and self-denial. It would indeed be singular for the individuals of a subject nation asked for the price of their liberty to say to the Disposer of Karma, "You shall give me so much in return for every individual sacrifice and we must know your terms beforehand. We will not trust you to the extent of a single pie worth of result for our sufferings." Not by such method such a spirit have subject nations been delivered.

YOGA.

What is yoga? The average man of the world generally connects yoga with living in forests and caves, and going about in sackcloth and ashes.

Yoga is union in partition, unity in diversity. It is the many becoming one. In it lies strength. I can easily break a twig, but a bundle of twigs defies my muscularity.

By a knowledge of the laws of union and disunion man has brought the powers of Nature under his control. Electricity comes down from the clouds to light our room, turn our fans, cook our meals, and brush our shoes. This is a matter of every day experience now.

Yoga is the focussing of man's various powers on any subject. Yoga may be physical, intellectual and spiritual as well as national and international.

Yoga begets power, and strength makes possible what is otherwise impossible.

Yoga is sometimes misunderstood. It is not the union of the human soul with God, for the soul and the oversoul are already in union. The soul is in God. God is in the soul, you can only unite what is not united. To talk of uniting the human soul in the God betrays an ignorance of the entire relation between God and man, between the creator and the created. It is insanity to talk of marriage of an already married couple. It will be just as unnatural to talk of uniting your material body with space, because every atom that has material existence is already in space.

Yoga is not the union of the human soul in the Divine soul. It is the uniting of all of the powers of the soul, the focussing of the scattered rays, as it were, in order to throw a strong flood of spiritual light on the hitherto unexplored regions of the spirit. There is the Light in us—in all. What we want is to know it, feel it, and see it. This is not uniting in a purely physical sense, but the object of yoga is actual perception, realisation of the Divine Personality, as well as development of the powers of the Soul.

Yoga is a means to an end. The end is not union, but perception and living realisation of God.

in the soul and the soul in God, as having its being in God, and living, moving, and eternally existing in God.

PHYSICAL YOGA.

The mechanic, chemist and carpenter know very well how to accomplish something by uniting or disuniting different things and component parts.

The Pyramids have been possible in the past by the united efforts of man. Look at the big warehouses, marts, wharves, armies and navies, and see what union amongst men can accomplish.

This new era in the history of mankind is an era of Yoga, of united effort amongst men and women. What was impossible fifty years ago has been possible now. The Railway, the telegraph the Post Office, or aerial navigation was the wildest dream of the ancients. A man who would talk of such things being possible was considered fit enough for nothing else and already on the highway to Bedlam. But to-day they are objects of actual experience to every man and woman and child. These things and much more are the results of physical union. We shall see by and by what man can accomplish by uniting amongst millions and nations.

The boxer puts the whole strength and weight of his body in one arm and into one blow. The sonata of Mozart and the soul-entrancing raptures of Tansen and Beethoven are due to the uniting together in a beautiful manner of the different sounds of the gamut. The Taj and the Apollo Belvedere and the Madonna owe their perfection of beauty to the knowledge of the union. Put the different parts together properly and you have the highest work of art. Take the parts separately and the enchantment is gone.

The manner, the procedure, the scientific method by which such results are brought about may be called Yoga. Similarly the process by which God is perceived in the soul is called Yoga.

INTELLECTUAL YOGA.

It is only when man can unite his scattered mental powers that he can accomplish anything great. Focus the mind, concentrate your attention properly, and the problem which hitherto laughed at your solutions is revealed to your ken and becomes clear as daylight.

By this sort of intellectual yoga Newton saw the law of gravitation in the falling apple,—Archimedes found the secret of specific gravity and cried "Eureka," and Edison unravelled the mysteries of Electricity.

It is only when man can thus withdraw himself entirely from the world of passing phenomena and retire into the chamber of silence within that he is face to face with Truth and can see and know truth at first hand. Truth is like Heaven's glorious sun that is not to be won with saucy looks. It requires whole-souled and continued effort of the mind to discover and know Truth and the laws of nature. It is by means of this Intellectual Yoga that man can work in the mine of Truth. Men of genius can take the necessary pains to go through this process. Genius has been defined to be the capacity for taking infinite pains in any matter. Truth has thus been worshipped by her votaries in all ages and in all climes. There is no other royal road to Truth. This process of knowing truth at first hand may be called Intellectual Yoga.

When the mind is absolutely absorbed in any pursuit, it loses touch with everything else. When our attention is entirely engaged in study of any subject, say, a beautiful piece of poetry, romance, painting or architecture, or in the interesting game of chess, we forget everything else and do not mind the ticking of the clock or the hum of human voices and are lost, as it were, to the world for the time being.

MEETING IN COLLEGE SQUARE.

BABU AUROBINDO GHOSE'S SPEECH.

The following is the full text of the speech of Babu Aurobindo Ghose who presided at Sunday's meeting in College Square:—

I thank you for the kindly welcome that you have accorded to me. The time fixed by the law for the breaking up of the meetings is also at hand, and I am afraid I have disappointed one or two speakers by getting up so soon. But there is just one word that has to be spoken to-day.

SIR E. BAKER'S SPEECH.

Recently a speech has been made in the Bengal Legislative Council by the L. C. of this province, a speech which I think is one of the most unfortunate and most amazing that have ever been delivered by a ruler in his position. The occasion of the speech was a meeting to obtain murders that have recently been committed in London. Those murders have been committed by a young man with whom there has been no proof that any other man in India or in England is connected, no proof that any conspiracy has been behind him. Not only so but the Police in London have declared that so far as their evidence goes they find that the murder was dictated by personal and not political motives. That crime is still the subject of a trial which has not been closed. Was this the time, was this the occasion for the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to rise from his seat in the Legislative Council and practically associate practically make the whole country responsible for the crime of a single isolated youth in London? Not only so, but the Lieutenant-Governor, in referring to the crime said that there had been plenty of denunciation in this country but those denunciations did not go far. And he wanted from us one thing more and that was co-operation. He wants co-operation from the whole community. He further saddled his request with the threat that if this co-operation were not obtained, steps would have to be taken in which there would be no room for nice discrimination between the innocent and the guilty.

The murders that have been committed in Bengal have been sufficiently proved by the failure of case after case to be the acts of isolated individuals. There has been only a single instance which is still subjudice, and if it even were fully established, it would only prove that the crime was done in one case by a small group of men. Under such circumstances what is the co-operation that the L.G. demands from us? He will not be satisfied if we denounce and disassociate ourselves from the crime. He wants co-operation. It is at least desirable that he should name and describe the co-operation he insists on before he carries out the remarkable threat with which he has sought to enforce his demand. There has been much talk recently, in a wider sense, of co-operation. Now, gentlemen, we are a people who demand self-government. We have a government in which we are not at all associated and over which we have no control. What is the co-operation a government of this kind can really demand from us? It can only demand from us obedience to the law, co-operation in keeping the law and observing peace and order. What further co-operation can they expect from us? Even in the matter which the L.G. has mentioned, we are at a loss to see how a people circumstanced like ourselves can help him. Still I have a proposal to make. I think there is only one way by which these unfortunate occurrences can be stopped. The ruler of Bengal in his speech spoke in approval of a certain speech made by Mr. Gokhale at Poona recently. In that speech Mr. Gokhale declared that the ideal of independence was an ideal which no sane man could hold. He said that it was impossible to achieve independence by peaceful means and the people who advocate the peaceful methods of passive resistance are men who, out of cowardice, do not speak out the thought that is in their heart. That idea of Mr. Gokhale's has been contradicted beforehand by the Sessions Judge of Alipore and even an Anglo-Indian paper was obliged to say that

Mr. Gokhale's justification of the repressions on the ground [that stern and relentless repression was the only possible attitude the Government could adopt towards the ideal of independence was absurd because the ideals and the thoughts of a nation could not be punished. This was a very dangerous teaching which Mr. Gokhale introduced into his speech, that the ideal of independence—whether we call it Swaraj or autonomy or Colonial Self-Government, because these two things in a country circumstanced like India meant in practice the same (loud applause),—cannot be achieved by peaceful means. Mr. Gokhale knows or ought to know that this ideal which he declares is deeply-rooted in the minds of thousands of the people and cannot be driven out. He has told the ardent hearts which cherish this ideal of independence, and are determined to strive towards it that their ideal can only be achieved by violent means. If any doctrine can be dangerous, if any teacher can be said to have uttered words dangerous to the peace of the country, it is Mr. Gokhale himself. (Loud cheers.) We have told the people that there is a peaceful means of achieving independence in whatever form we aspire to it. We have said that by self-help, by passive resistance we can achieve it. We have told the young men of our country, "Build up your own industries, build up your own schools and colleges, settle your own disputes. You are always told that you are not fit for self-government. Show by example that you are fit to govern yourselves, show it by developing self-government through self-help and not by depending upon others." There is a second limb to that policy and it is passive resistance. Passive resistance means two things. It means first that in certain matters we shall not co-operate with the Government of this country until it gives us what we consider our rights. Secondly, if we are persecuted, if the plough of repression is passed over us, we shall meet it not by violence, but by suffering, by passive resistance, by lawful means. We have not said to our young men, "when you are repressed, retaliate;" we have said, "suffer." Now we are told that by doing so we are encouragers of sedition and anarchism. We have been told by Anglo-Indian papers that by speaking in Beadon Square and other places on patriotism and the duty of suffering we encourage sedition. We are told that in preaching passive resistance we are encouraging the people to violate law and order and are fostering violence and rebellion. The contrary is the truth. We are showing the people of this country in passive resistance the only way in which they can satisfy their legitimate aspiration without breaking the law and without resorting to violence. This is the only way we can find to co-operate in maintaining peace and order. The co-operation we expect from the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal not from the Government of this country in return is that they will respect the primary rights of the people of this country, they will respect the right of public meeting and the right of a free press and the right of free association. If they co-operate so far then we can assure them that this movement will advance on peaceful lines and the thing which troubles them will cease for ever. But the L.G. says that measures will be passed which will observe no nice discrimination between the innocent and the guilty. A more cynical statement has seldom issued from a ruler in the position of Sir Edward Baker. If the threat is carried out, who will be the gainers? I do not deny that it may for a time stop our public activities. It may force the school of peaceful self-development and passive resistance to desist for a while from its activities at least in their present form. But who will gain by it? Not the Government neither Mr. Gokhale and his school of passive co-operation. It is the very terrorists, the very anarchists, whom you wish to put down, who will gain by it. It will remove from the people their one hope, but it will give the terrorists a fresh incentive and it will teach the violent hearts, the undisciplined and ardent minds a very dangerous lesson that there is no peaceful way to the fulfilment of their aspirations and the consequence will be such as one trembles to contemplate. I trust the threat will never be carried out. I trust that the Government will be ruled by wise counsels and consider the matter more carefully. There are ominous signs and it seems as if measures were about to be passed which will put an end to the right of public meeting and the public expression of our feelings. But I trust that wiser counsels will yet prevail. The Government should remember that it stands dissociated from the people by its very constitution. If it wants co-operation it cannot get the co-operation which is simply another name for passive obedience. That is the doctrine which is being taught to day, the doctrine of the divine right of officials and the obligation on the people of passive obedience. That is a doctrine which no modern nation can accept. No modern nation can accept the extinction of its legitimate and natural hopes. Co-operation can only be given if the Government which is now alien becomes our own, if the people have a share in it, not merely in name, not merely by the right of talk in the legislative council, not merely by apparent concessions, but by getting some measure of control in the matter of legislation, in the expenditure of the taxes they are called on to pay for the maintenance of the administration, if, in short, they can be given some starting-point from which in future the Government of the country can be developed into a Government of the people. That is the only condition upon which the co-operation, of which we hear so much now-a-days, can be given. Without it co-operation is a satire, it is a parody. It is the co-operation in which one side acts and the other side merely says, "yes" which is demanded of us. We cannot give our sanction to such co-operation. So long as even that little of substantial self-government is not conceded to us, we have no choice but to cleave firmly to passive resistance as the only peaceful path to the realisation of our legitimate aspirations. We cannot sacrifice our country. We cannot give up the ideal that is dear to our heart. We cannot sacrifice our Mother. If you take away our primary rights all that is left for us is passive resistance and peacefully to suffer, peacefully to refuse the parody of co-operation which we are asked to give.

SWADESHI IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY: AN ACCOUNT OF RECENT DEVELOP- MENTS.—I.

(From the Dawn.)
INTRODUCTORY.

We have described in great detail in some previous numbers, the growth of the Textile Swadeshi in the Presidency of Bombay which as we noticed, though threatened in its China market, has been steadily gaining ground in the home (Indian) market, thanks to the growing expansion of the Swadeshi Movement in India. For the rich Bombay Mill-owner, unmindful of the depression abroad, has been, to quote the London Times "busy increasing his spindles and looms and calculating his well-earned profit in all ease and comfort, under the blessing of the Swadeshi-Beycott Movement." Not only this; but there has been visible a marked endeavour on the part of the capitalists to launch forth many other concerns in the industrial and commercial lines.

To give our readers an account of the many-sided activities shown by the people of the Western Presidency we give the following brief account of the many industries that have of late sprung up there, this account, however, including no information about the growth of industries in the Native States in the Presidency. [We may add here that we are collecting materials for an independent article on the latter subject, which, in due course, will be published in this journal.]

MATCH-MANUFACTURE.

This industry has been taken up here more earnestly than in any other province of India. The following is a brief account of the factories started.

The Belgaum Match-Manufacturing.—This Company was started recently at Belgaum with a capital of Rs. 30,000 divided into 1200 shares of Rs. 25 each. The Secretaries of the Company are S. J. Vaman Appaji Nilajkar and S. J. Balkrishna Hari Khataw, both of whom learned the industry in Japan. The wood used is obtained from the same locality. The matches manufactured there have already been placed on the market. The office Company is 699 Aditwar Peth, Belgaum.

* We omitted to give in our previous accounts of the Indian Textile Industry a reference to a Bengali Mill enterprise at Ahmedabad, in the shape of the "Sree Ramkrishna Mills," of Ahmedabad which is a purely Swadeshi concern, conceived, controlled and conducted by Bengalis. The reason of the promoters having selected Ahmedabad as the site is that many advantages are to be had there which are practically absent here. Thus a workshop in Bengal would cost at least Rs. 10,000 to equip but at Ahmedabad with so many mills working there is no necessity of setting up exclusively for the new enterprise. We understand the dhobis, saris, mulla, etc., turned out by the "Sree Ram-Krishna Mills" are excellent in quality up to the mark.

The Deccan Match-Manufacturing Company.—This Company was launched early in the beginning of the current year at Satara. Buildings having been secured ready-made at Karad, and machinery all fitted up, operations have already been begun on a grand scale. Match-wood, match-boxes, etc., used here being of good quality, the matches are said to burn steadily and easily.

The Karnatak Match-Factory, Dharwar.—This Factory was started nearly a year ago at Dharwar. The safety-matches manufactured in this factory are said to burn steadily and the general get-up of the boxes is good.

The Western India Match Works.—This Company has been recently started at Bombay with a capital of a lakh of rupees divided into 4,000 shares of Rs. 20 each. Messrs. D. B. Chitria, B.A., LL.B., Baghavayya, B.Sc., LL.B., M.V., Athley, B.A., and G.N. Potdar, B.A., (Chemical Engineer) are on the Directorate, while Messrs. Ramchandra & Co., are the Managing Agency. The special merit of the Company is that two of the officers on its Managing Agency have the qualification of having done practical work in large Match-Factories in Japan, while Mr. G. N. Potdar, B.A., who is on the Directorate is a passed Chemical Engineer from the Imperial University of Tokio, in Japan. Some other salient features of the Company are (1) the manufacture of the chemicals required for the purpose of which a Laboratory-Workshop is about to be erected; (2) practical help given by responsible Government Forest Officers with regard to the proper site, wood, etc., (3) assurance of 6 p. c. dividend to shareholders and (4) the opportunity given to the rich and the poor alike keeping the value of each share at Rs. 20 only.

The Gujarat Islam Factory of Ahmedabad.—This Factory, though started earlier than those mentioned above, deserves mention here. It has excellent machinery, imported from Germany, on which the proprietor, a Mahomedan, spent about a lakh of rupees. A large number of workmen are employed there. Matches manufactured there are largely sold in the town itself, while a good quantity is sent to Southern India. The white match-wood grows plentifully in the woody hills of Panch Mahals, but the Railway freight rates seriously diminish the profit. A European expert has been engaged for this factory under whose management the quality of the matches manufactured has greatly improved.

All these Match-factories, if they prove to be eventually successful, will not only be able to put a stop to the foreign annual drain of about 65 lakhs of rupees from the country, but will be an object-lesson to other provinces which have not as yet taken to match-manufacturing on a truly proper scale.

CUTLERY, BRASS-WARE, ETC.

The Penkar Cutlery Co., Ltd.—This long-standing Factory has been turning out various kinds of knives, razors, scissors, etc., which may favourably be compared with imported articles, both in respect of quality and price. The manager is Mr. Monohar who received his training in London.

Among the flourishing hand-industries in the department, may be mentioned, spear-heads of Ahmednagar, hunting-knives, swords, and chain armour in Cutch, Kathiawar and Baroda, brass wares of Nasik and Poona, and brass utensils of the Bombay city and of Ahmedabad.

SUGAR-MANUFACTURES.

There is one sugar-factory at Akole (Belgaum), which is conducted by Messrs. Kulakarni and Co., on the Hadi principle. The sugar manufactured here is said to have excelled imported sugar in taste.

The sugar-factories at Kolhaour, Bridhal and Hudli have up-to-date machineries. The total annual out-put is worth about Rs. 50,000.

LEATHER AND PAPER MANUFACTURES.

There are several leather-factories in the city of Bombay. There are also others in the Presidency:—e. g., a factory at Navasari (Surat), two in the Native State of Gwalior, namely, Scindhia Leather Factory and the Mortor Tannery; also a recently-started Chrome tanning factory, in the State of Baroda,—all owing their birth to the Swadeshi Movement.

The hand-made leather industry, too, has undergone a great development during the last few years. Among articles of leather work are saddle covers, shoes, legging, and accoutrement manufactured in Sindh, not to mention the time-honoured manufacture of shields at Ahmedabad.

Quite recently Mr. J. W. Dhupkar of Alibagh has manufactured a kind of red leather as highly polished as imported articles.

There are paper-mills located at Gwalior (Scindhia Mills), Bombay (Girgaum Mills), Surat (four small mills) and Poona (Reay mills), most of which are managed by Indians.

As regards hand-industry under this heading, coarse paper is still to some extent manufactured from vegetable fibres in several of the large towns in the Presidency, especially at Ahmedabad and Baroda.

THE ANAKAPALLE PENCIL FACTORY.

AN APPEAL.

Gentlemen, when the swadeshi movement is being preached everywhere in India both on the platform and in private conversation, it is not too much to expect support for the above small concern and we expect at least a little material self-sacrifice in action as a proof of surety of word and mind. Swadeshi spirit is not purely a spirit calculating profits alone but a spirit full of patriotism. (One's Own Country) ready to make self-sacrifice. "He is a good Divine that follows his own instructions" says Shakespeare.

The above company is registered under the Indian co's act with one lac of rupees as capital divided into 10,000 shares of two rupees each. A few shares only are available. The Directors expect 20 per cent. net profit. Extracts from some of the testimonials are published below and they will, I think, convince the public that the company is not a bogus one.

Amrita Bazar Patrika writes under date June 1, 1908. "The factory has already commenced manufacturing pencils of different variety and from the specimens that we have seen, they are in no way, inferior to what we usually get in the market. Speaking of the competency of Mr. Narayanarow, the managing director of the factory, the Bal Gungadhar Tilak writes "I have discussed with Mr. Narayanarow his scheme for starting a small pencil factory and the idea appears to me to be quite possible. I wish him every success and I have no doubt that he deserves it fully." The Asst. Registrar of joint stock companies writing of this factory observes that it is the most economically managed concern in his jurisdiction. Mr. J. C. N. Fowler the Head Asst. collector of Vizagapatam writes "I confidently recommend the concern as an investment." Mr. Dinsha Edulji Wacha writes "I am convinced that your pencil making is bound to succeed." The Hon. Mr. Sarada Chandra Mitter, late a well known justice of the Calcutta High Court writes under date

June 24, 1908. "I have made considerable enquiries as to the Industrial Development Co., Ltd. Anakapalle. It is not a bogus company, but although small, it has a substantial footing. I have after enquiries applied for shares and I expect other gentlemen in Bengal will come forward to support the undertaking. I may say that some of the companies that are being floated will in all likelihood fail, but a good many will survive to the benefit of the country and I have reason to believe that the Anakapalle company will survive." Babu Arabindo Ghosh writes. "The Anakapalle Pencil Factory is, I believe, the only institution for its purpose begun on the scale and with the preparations necessary for success. The shares are very small being only Rs. 10 and therefore it is written the competence of most to take a few shares. I hope the public of Bengal will contribute their share by taking part if not all the shares and thus assure the capture of one very important article of manufacture by that Swadeshi movement of which Bengal is the cradle." In the words of Dewan Bahadur R. V. Dhamanskar, Ex Dewan of Baroda State "It is the bounden duty of every son and daughter of India to do all that he or she can to revive the indigenous industry without which, as our wise men in the country have declared, the regeneration of the country would be practically impossible. I have every confidence that all sensible people will join me by generously contributing to the undertaking to ensure its success."

SAMADHAY'S CASE.

THE APPROVER.

Mr. S. C. Mullick, Additional Sessions Judge, Presiding over, the Howrah Criminal Sessions, on Tuesday resumed the hearing of the case in which Pandit Mokhoda Charan Samadhayi stands charged with having harboured two dacoits in connection with the Biglali case.

THE APPROVER.

The examination-in-chief of Paana Lal Chatterjee was concluded at about 3-30 P.M. when he was cross-examined by Mr. N. C. Sen Bar-at-Law, for the defence.

Witness stated:—I gave up my studies three years ago. I have been sitting at home idling away my time, without doing any work. I remember the Bighati Case in High Court. Since the Bighati case I have been doing nothing, except working as a Police informer. I confessed because I repented. After repenting, I became approver. I did state before the Deputy Magistrate that I first met Kartic Dutta at the time of the "Ardhodya Yoga." I first came to know Mokhoda at the Telinipara house on the afternoon of the day of the dacoity. I had never seen Mokhoda before that. I came to know Suresh Mitra the day that we first became known to Mokhoda. I may have said in the lower Court that our gang consisted of Kartic Dutta, Dhiren Ghosh, Biren Mullick, Suresh Mitra, Lalit Ganguly, Jiten Rai and others.

Mr. Sen: Did you read your deposition in the lower Court, before you signed it?—Yes.

Mr. Sen: Did you notice any mistake there?—I do not remember.

Mr. Sen: Did you live in Ram Mohan Shah's Lane?—Yes, the "Yugantar" office was there.

Mr. Sen: Where did you go after your gang as you said, had removed from there?—To Chetla, Durgapur, I had been to 28, Shib Naran Dass's Lane after that.

To further questions, witness replied: I said in the lower court, that Kartic Dutt, Dhiren Ghosh, Biren Mullick, Suresh Mitter, Lalit Ganguly, Jiten Roy and others lived at 28, Shampukur Street. I showed the letter came from Benares from Mokhoda to Ram Sital Maitra. I got that letter back and I kept it in my possession. I tore it up probably after two or three days. I remember distinctly that I did not take it to Manickganj in Dacca District. I don't remember that I ever said I tore that letter up after I had gone to Baroda Babu's house.

Mr. Sen : If you had said so that is false ?—It is a mistake.

Mr. Sen : It is false then ?—No why should it be false. It is a mistake.

The approver's statement in the lower Court was then read over by Counsel, which was to the effect that the witness tore the letter up in the house of Baroda Kanto Mukerjee.

The witness being asked whether he had any doubt as to the accuracy of this statement, answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Sen: What reason have you to doubt that? Was the Magistrate short sighted or hard of hearing—No, because I do not remember exactly what I said.

Mr. Sen: When did you assume the name of Nanda Kumar?—At Bally, I assumed it when I gave my name to Ram Sital Babu.

Witness continued:—I do not remember when Sureah Mitter assumed the name of "Motilal." Probably at Shahegunj. It may be at Bally. There was no consultation between ourselves about our assuming names. I do not remember, how we were described in the letters written by Pandit Mokhoda Charan Samadhyai. I do not remember the exact wording of the letters, but the purport of that. Although I have heard these letters read out to me several times in Court I did not remember whether the name of the "two boys" were mentioned there. The "two boys" were mentioned in the letter, but could not definitely say in which of the letter it was written.

Mr. Sen: Why did you say at first then that you did not remember whether the names were at all in the letter?—Because I could not understand your question very well.

At this stage the Court rose for the day.

NEWS.

THE EX-SHAH OF PERSIA.—

A Russian circular to the Powers declares that the Shah's taking refuge in the Russian Legation in no way modifies the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of Persia laid down in the circular of 14th July.

THE MIDNAPORE ENQUIRY.—

On the 19th the following petition was made to the Commissioner by Babu Pyari Mohan Das regarding the boy Bonomali Das who was alleged to have placed the bomb in Pyari Babu's house. Sir,—I beg most respectfully to bring your Honour's notice to the fact that I have been informed that Bonomali Das, who was a witness for the defence in the Midnapore conspiracy case in the Sessions Court, has been cited as a witness in the inquiry which is being held by your Honour and that certain police officers against whom the charge of fabricating evidence has been laid, have been trying to get hold of the boy for some time past and that the boy had been with them the day before yesterday. This morning one of the principal policemen whose conduct is under investigation, was taking the boy with him in the public road. I apprehend that undue influence is being exercised over the boy. I hope your Honour will make an enquiry about this matter and do justice to the case.

The petition was presented by Pyari Babu while Bonomali Das was being examined. We, the press representatives, are quite in the dark as to what this important witness has stated as he is not to be found anywhere in the town. There is a strong rumour current that he has been taken to Santragachi for the verification of certain statements that he had made in the Sessions Court. Certain rumours regarding the manner in which Bonomali was taken away from his house this morning led us to see his mother in the evening. She said that in the morning Bonomali was sitting in the house when a certain constable with two or three others suddenly appeared and handed over a paper, ostensibly the summons, and had it signed by him. No sooner the signature was got than the constables seized the boy and literally dragged him away. A certain police officer was standing in the lane close by. The mother does not know of the boy's whereabouts since then. Sensational developments are expected.

THE CASE THAT MATTERS.—

The "Calcutta Weekly Notes" in noticing the judgment of the High Court in the Calcutta Bomb case makes the just comment that, having regard to the disclosures in this case, the Executive Government would have done better to have set its mind at rest about the alleged conspiracy and "turn its undivided attention to the raising of the moral tone of the Magistracy and the Police which in this country certainly stands at present at a very low level." Neglect of so obvious a method of correction is really at the bottom of these Police scandals. Police reform has taken a wholly vicious turn, for while the cost of maintaining the Police has enormously increased, there is no corresponding improvement in moral or method of work. It is as certain as any thing can be that the Police will never improve so long as Magistrates feel compelled to convict on grounds of policy. The discovery of crime is no doubt a legitimate function of the Magistracy in India, as Sir Edward Candy points out in a letter to the Congress Organ, "India," reproduced elsewhere. But it does not follow from this that the Magistrates must "find" evidence for the Police or countenance objectionable Police methods of "finding" evidence. We do not understand Sir Edward Candy to claim the authority of Sir William Markby, Sir Maxwell Melville and Sir James Stephen for the preposterous proposition that "necessary measures to ensure a conviction" comprehend extortion or fabrication of evidence.

EASTERN BENGAL TRADE.—

The outstanding features of Eastern Bengal trade during the last official year were the diminution in the coasting trade and the increase under foreign trade, by over a crore of rupees, counter-balanced however by a decrease in the imports of salt, provisions and hardware and cutlery. Another feature, to which Government draws the attention of the Forest Department, is the increase in the imports of "wood and manufacture of wood" due to importations from Australia by the Assam Bengal Railway. Rice and paddy exported in 1906-07 was only 373 maunds and in the following year 7,906. But thanks to improved agricultural conditions, the export aggregated 16,661. Jute exports were Rs. 77.48 lakhs or 35.7 per cent. better. An arrangement has been made by Assam-Bengal Railway for a new service of steamers between London and Chittagong, which, as the Board of Revenue remarks, will doubtless be proved of the greatest service to the trade of the Province. Proposals for dredging the port of Chittagong and improving its Jetty accommodation are under consideration.

THE NEW SHAH OF PERSIA.—

The new Shah, who is thirteen years old, left the Russian Legation yesterday and drove escorted by two Indian sowars and two Russian Cossacks to Sultanabad Palace where he was formally informed of his accession. The escort returned on reaching the gate of the Palace indicating that the new Sultan was no longer under Anglo-Russian protection.

FATEHJANGPUR MURDER.—

The Fatehjangpur murder case, in which Nishi Kanta Banerjee was charged with murdering a brother of Gobesh, a police informer, was taken up to-day by the Sub-divisional officer. Three witnesses, including accused's father were examined and the case was adjourned to August 3rd.

MR. SYAMJI KRISHNA VARMA ON SURENDRA NATH.—

While Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee has been posing before the British public as the real representative of India and attempting to connect Syamji with the recent London murders Syamji, in a letter to the Times, declares that Babu Surendra Nath is a sycophant and self-seeking flatterer praising the foreign yoke, and says it is a mistake to rely on the loyalty of the Indian masses, who are joining in the great revolution now beginning in earnest.

STAMM ON THE LONDON MURDER:—

Mr. Krishnavarma, in a letter to the "Times" while saying that he is absolutely unconnected with the deed, approves of the assassination of Sir W. Curzon-Wyllie. With regard to Dhangra he says that he is a martyr to the cause of Indian independence. He predicts that ere long a catastrophe will stagger humanity unless the British withdraw from India.

INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST:—

Mr. Arthur Horelly, Printer of "Indian Sociologist," has been committed for trial on a charge of printing scandalous and seditious libel. He pleaded not-guilty and was released on bail.

PRESS CONFISCATION:—

The rule issued in the "Tilak" press confiscation case by the District Magistrate, Hoshiarpur, calling upon the editor and proprietor to show cause why the order of confiscation should not be made absolute will be hard on the 30th instant.

SPLEEN-RUPTURE:—

A punkha coolie was, it is alleged, done to death in the Infantry lines of the Camerons at Cawnpur about a week ago. Military doctors traced death to spleen-rupture. The Cantonment Magistrate has taken up the enquiry.

GIFT TO MR. MACKARNESS:—

The Lahore Indian Association at a meeting passed resolutions expressing abhorrence at the London outrage, sorrow at Lord Ripon's death, and disapproval of concessions to the Moslem League. It further resolved to present Mr. Mackarness, M. P., with a silver tea-set of Kashmir make for his advocacy of the cause of the Deportees.

THE LONDON MURDER.

COURT PROCEEDINGS.

The police-court proceedings at Westminster, where the arrested man—whose name was given as Madan Lal Dhangra—was brought up before Mr. Horace Smith on the morning of July 2nd, were very brief.

The prisoner was remanded for a full period of eight days at the request of the prosecuting solicitor after formal evidence had been given by two police officers of his arrest and being charged.

The prisoner was led into court by a police officer, who held him firmly by the arm and placed him in the dock, where he remained standing with his hands in his pockets and leaning against the front rail during the brief period he was in court. He was dressed in a well-worn dark lounge suit, and with his gold-rimmed spectacles and thin face he looked like a native student of not very ample means.

He only spoke once, and that was when asked by the clerk if he had any question to put to Superintendent Isaacs, who gave evidence as to the charge against him. This, as the prosecuting solicitor had previously explained to the magistrate in his opening statement, was "the wilful murder of Sir Curzon-Wyllie and Dr. Cawas Lalca."

The prisoner hesitated when asked for any question, then blurted out very rapidly, "Only one, sir. It was not wilful murder in the case of Dr. Lalca." The rest of his question was lost in the torrent of words which came from the prisoner.

"Did you hear what he said" asked the solicitor of the Superintendent. "Not all of it, sir," replied the officer. But the prisoner was not asked to repeat his words.

EVIDENCE OF ARREST.

Evidence of the arrest was given by Constable Frederick Nichols, of the B Division. He stated that about ten minutes past eleven the previous night, in consequence of certain information, he went to the Indian section of the Imperial Institute. He there saw the prisoner being held by some gentlemen.

He also saw the bodies of Sir Curzon-Wyllie and Dr. Lalca.

He took the prisoner into custody. After an interval he was taken to the Walton-street police-station. He was detained there for a time, and then charged.

The constable added that he saw Sir Curzon-Wyllie was dead on his arrival. Dr. Lalca, however, was still alive.

The prisoner, on being asked if he wished to put any questions to the constable, merely shook his head.

Superintendent Albert Isaacs stated that the prisoner was at Walton-street on his arrival about 11-30 a. m. When he was charged he saw him nod his head, while his lips moved, but he could not hear if he said anything.

This evidence and the incident of the prisoner's question, already described, concluded the proceedings.

After a momentary consultation with his clerk and the prosecuting solicitor, the magistrate remanded the prisoner for eight days.

It was a noticeable feature that no Indians were present in the court or outside when the case came on. At the hearing of the assault case in which Sir William Lee-Warner figured some months ago the court was thronged with young Indians resident in London.

Mr. Musket, who prosecuted on behalf of the police, stated that there was more behind that case than appeared.

INDIAN PAPER MILLS.

Despite the existence of paper mills in India, the yearly imports of paper of all sorts are very large and rapidly increasing. The imports figures for the last five years, for example, have been, in lakhs of rupees, 52.18, 64.37, 70.48, 80.11 and 99.24.

LAHORE EXHIBITION.

The estimated expenses of the forthcoming Lahore Industrial Exhibition amount to three lakhs. The Municipal grant is Rs. 10,000, public subscriptions amount to Rs. 23,000, the local Government grant is one lakh, Rs. 25,000 is expected from the Frontier Government and a like amount from the Kashmir State.

BURMESE PONIES.

Sanction has been given to the addition of a Deputy Superintendent to the establishment of Civil Veterinary Department in Burma in connection with pony breeding in the province. The scheme contemplates the purchase of twelve Shan stallions, of which eight will be located in Shan States and four in Burma. The syces and others to be employed under the scheme will receive six months' training in the Army Remount Department.

GROUND-NUT.

Experiments in ground-nut cultivation in 1908 are reported to have given good results at all Government Agricultural Stations in Eastern Bengal and Assam. The Experiments are being repeated this year on a commercial scale with a view to the introduction of this crop into the Province. No sign of disease is said to have appeared any where last year, with the doubtful exception of Rangpur.

THE SWADESHI WEAVING CO., LTD.
We have received a copy of the Prospectus and Balance Sheet of the above Company, which was started early in 1906, as a result of the swadeshi movement, for the purpose of manufacturing on a large scale, better class of woollen goods which had hitherto been turned out by some mills in Upper India, which are to all purposes pure European concerns. Starting with a capital of Rs. 50,000, the Company was able to establish its factory and commence manufacturing operations. They paid a dividend of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. from the beginning. The work had been gradually expanding and as a result, the capital of the Company has been raised to Rs. 250,000. The value of each share is Rs. 25 and payments have to be made by monthly instalments, so that all classes of men can buy them. Its manufactures, have elicited the praise and admiration of even of competent and critical Judges; the Company has also been the recipient of medals at several exhibitions. An inspection of their goods, at their Calcutta Depot at 12, Lalbazar, show that there is nothing left to desire in their make and finish, while the prices are very moderate if not cheap.

RUBBER

Our new province is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of Mr. R. L. Proudlock, Curator of Gardens and Parks on the Nilgiris, who has advised the Government of Bombay upon prospects of rubber cultivation on the West Coast of that Presidency. He passed through Madras last Wednesday, 30th ultimo, on his way here, our new Government having requisitioned his services for this Province, with a view, we presume, of his superintending its cultivation of rubber. Mr. Proudlock having rendered such good service in another Presidency, we are sure his advice be of great value in our New Province. "E. B. and A. Era."

RIVAL BUSINESS COMPANIES.

In the midst of the prevailing excitement caused by the establishment of the Trading and Banking Corporation as a sort of counterpoise to the Jessore Loan Company, yet another Company with a capital of Rs. 50,000 has been recently floated at Jessore under the name and style of the United Banking Corporation. The United Banking Corporation bears to the Trading and Banking Corporation the same relation as the latter to the Loan Company. The capital of this third Company is divided into 25,000 shares of Rs. 2 each, its accredited Bankers being the Jessore Loan Company, Ltd. The establishment of these new rival trading bodies has caused an amount of excitement which baffles all description. It has given rise to a brisk and healthy competition.

PONY-BREEDING.

Reviewing the report of Pony-breeding operations in Madras, the Board of Revenue remarks that it is highly desirable in the public interests to continue pony breeding operations for another period of three years at least before abandoning the experiment altogether. Poor as the results of pony-breeding have been in the past, it is nevertheless a fact that they have contributed appreciably to the maintenance and improvement of an important and useful class of animals the jukka ponies in at least a few localities. The Board is accordingly loath to recommend the suspension of operations without further trial. The Madras Government remarks that if more care were taken in the selection of officers for the charge of the stations, better results might be obtained. The registration of such ponies is also suggested.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The spirit in Asia.

A spirit moves abroad in the world today upsetting kingdoms and raising up new principalities and powers the workings of which are marked by a swiftness and ubiquity new in history. In place of the slow developments and uncertain results of the past we have a quickness and thoroughness which destroy in an hour and remould in a decade. It is noteworthy that these rapid motions are mostly discernible in Asiatic peoples.

The Persian Revolution.

The Persian Revolution has settled with a swiftness and decisiveness second only to the movement of Turkey the constitutional struggle in Iran between a reactionary Shah and a rejuvenated, eager and ardent nation. The weak and unstable promise-breaker at Teheran has fallen, mourned by a sympathetic Anglo-India but by no one else in the world. Since the late Shah under the pressure of passive resistance yielded a constitution to his people, the young Nationalism of Persia has been attempting to force or persuade his son to keep the oaths with which he started his reign. Some deeds of blood on both sides, some sharp encounters have attended the process but the price paid has been comparatively small. Like other Asiatic States in a similar process of transformation Persia has rejected the theoretic charms of a republic; she has set up a prince who is young enough to be trained to the habits of a constitutional monarch before he takes up the authority of kingship. In this we see the political wisdom, self-restraint and instinct for the right thing to be done which is natural to ancient nations who, though they have grown young again, are not raw and violent peoples new to political thought and experiment.

Persia's difficulties.

A great and difficult task lies before the newly-risen nation. No other people is so difficultly circumstanced as the Persians. Weak in herself, long a stranger to good government, military strength and discipline, financial soundness and internal efficiency, Persia has to evolve all these under the instant menace from north and south of two of the greatest European empires. The threat of Russia to act herself if the new government does not instantly guarantee security on its borders a threat made on the morrow of a violent coup d'etat and before there has been time for the Regency to cope with any of the immediate difficulties surrounding it, is typical of the kind of peril which this proximity is likely to produce. Self-restraint and patience towards these doubtful friends and unbounded energy and decision within are the only qualities by which the statesmen of Persia can surmount the difficulties in their path and satisfy the claims posterity makes upon them. The internal re-organisation of Persia and the swift development of military strength are the first needs. Till then Persia must bear and forbear.

The new men in Persia.

It is worthy of notice that Sipahidar and Sardar Assad, the Bakhtyari leader, who have effected this revolution, are men who in their youth have studied in Europe. They should know the springs of European politics and thoroughly understand the way in which European Powers have to be dealt with as well as the necessities and conditions of internal reorganisation. The problem for all Asiatic peoples is the preservation of their national individuality and existence while equipping themselves with the weapons of the modern struggle for survival. A deep study of European politics, a strong feeling for Asiatic institutions and ideals, a selfless patriotism and immense faith, courage and self-restraint are the qualities essential to their leaders in these critical times. It is reassuring to find Persians high in praise of the self denying and lofty character of the new Regent. In the absence of a patriotic King like the Mikado such a man alone can form the centre of national reconstruction.

Madanlal Dhingra.

Madanlal Dhingra pays the inevitable and foreseen penalty of his crime. We have no wish whatever to load the memory of this unfortunate young man with curses and denunciations. Rather we hope that in his last moments he will be able to look back in a calm spirit on his act and with a mind enlightened by the near approach of death prepare his soul for the great transit. No man but he can say what were the real motives for his deed. If personal resentment and exaggerated emotions were the cause of his crime, a realisation of the true nature of the offence may yet help the soul in its future career. If on the other hand a random patriotism was at its back, we have little hope that reflection will induce him to change his views. Minds imbued with these ideas are the despair of the statesman and the political thinker. They follow their bent with a remorseless firmness which defies alike the arrows of the reasoner and the terrors of a violent death. He must in that case go forth to reap the fruits in other bodies and new circumstances. Here his country remains behind to bear the consequences of his act.

Press Garbage in England.

It is at least gratifying to find that the theory of conspiracy is exploded except in the minds of Anglo-Indian papers and perhaps of a few Anglo-Indian statesmen and officials. Not a single circumstance has justified the wild suspicions and wild inventions which journals like the Daily Mail and Daily Express poured thick upon the world in the first few days that followed the occurrence. These strange fictions are still travelling to us by mail. The most extraordinary of them is perhaps that launched by a certain gentleman who is bold enough to give his name, upon the World. It seems that long ago the redoubtable Krishnavarma in a moment of benign and expansive frankness selected this gentleman and revealed to him the details of a gigantic plot he has been elaborating for the last eight years with a view to the murder wholesale and retail of Anglo-Indian officials. If the story were true, Krishnavarma's confidant ought certainly to have been put in the dock as an accessory before the crime on the ground of criminal concealment. These romances sound ridiculous enough now that we read them three weeks afterwards when the excitement of the hour has passed, but the harm this kind of journalism can do was sufficiently proved at the time of the Chinese disturbances and the trouble which proceeded the Boer War. That these daily voidings of impudent falsehood and fabrication should be eagerly swallowed by thousands shows the rapid deterioration of British dignity and sobriety.

Shyamji Krishnavarma.

The exaggerated view of Mr Shyamji Krishnavarma as an arch conspirator of malign subtlety and power who has long been inculcating terrorist opinions among young men and building up a secret society, is one which none can accept who has any knowledge of this gentleman's past career. Mr. Shyamji Krishnavarma is an earnest, vehement and outspoken idealist passionately attached to his own views and intolerant of all who oppose them. He first went to England to breathe the atmosphere of a free country where he could speak as well as think as he chose. He was then a strong constitutionalist and his chief intellectual pre-occupations were Herbert Spencer, Home Rule and the position of the Native States. When the new movement flooded India it carried Mr Krishnavarma forward with it. He became an ardent Nationalist, a confirmed passive resister with an idealistic aversion to violent methods and a strong conviction that, whatever might be the case with other countries, India would neither need nor resort to them. His conversion to Terrorism is quite recent and has astonished most those who know him best. We know that S. J. Bepin Pal went to England with the confident expectation of finding full sympathy and co-operation from the editor of the Indian Sociologist. The quarrel between the two resulting from the change in Mr Krishnavarma's views is a matter of public knowledge. We refuse therefore to believe that Mr. Krishnavarma has been a plotter of assassination and secret disseminator of Terrorism or that the India House is a centre for the propagation and fulfilment of the ideas he has himself ventilated in the Times.

Nervous Anglo-India.

Time was when Srijut Surendranath Banerjee was held by nervous Anglo-India to be the crowned King of an insurgent Bengal, a very pestilent fellow flooding the country with sedition and rebellion. The whirligig of Time brings round with it strange revenges and at this moment Srijut Surendranath is returning to India acclaimed by English Conservatives as a pillar of the British Empire, India's representative with a mighty organisation behind him pledged to loyalty, co-operation and the support of Morleyan reform. After Surendranath, Srijut Bepin Chandra Pal, reputed editor of Bande Mataram and author of the great Madras speeches, loomed as the arch-plotter of revolution and the chief danger to the Empire. The same Bepin Chandra is now a peaceable and unsuspected journalist and lecturer in London acquitted, we hope, of all wish to be the Ravana destined to shake the British Kailas. But Anglo-India needs a bogeyman and by a few letters to the Times Mr. Krishnavarma has leaped into that eminent but unenviable position. Who knows? In another year or two even he may be considered a harmless if inconvenient idealist. What is it, one wonders, that has turned the firm, phlegmatic Briton into a nervous quaking old woman in love with imaginative terrors? Is it democracy? Is it the new sensationalist Press run by Harmsworth and Company? The phenomenon is inexplicable, but it is to be feared it is going to be permanent.

The Recoll of Karma.

There is a general law that Karma rebounds upon the doer. Associated in Hindu philosophy mainly with the individual and the theory of rebirth, this truth has also been recognised as equally applicable on other lines to the present life and to the destiny of nations. The karma of the British people in India has been of a mixed quality. So far as it has opened the gates of Western knowledge to the people of this country it has been good and in return the thought and knowledge of India has poured back upon Europe to return the gift with overmeasure.

Had they in addition consciously drew up and educated the whole people, all the fruits of that good Karma would have gone to England. But the education they have given is bad, meagre and restricted to the few, and their sympathy for the people has been formal and deficient. In consequence the main flood of the new thought and knowledge has been diverted to America, the giant of the future, which alone of the nations has shown an active and practical sympathy and understanding of our nation. British karma in India has been bad in so far as it has destroyed our industries and arrested our national development. This Karma is also beginning to recoil, patently in Boycott and unrest, much more subtly in the growing demoralisation of British politics. Already the jealous love of liberty is beginning to wane in the upper classes in England, political thinkers are emerging who announce the failure of democracy, the doctrine of the rule of the strong man is gaining ground and the temptation to strengthen the executive at the expense of the liberty of the citizen is proving too powerful even for a Radical Government. It seems impossible that even a veiled despotism or a virtual oligarchy should ever again rule in England, yet stranger things have happened in history. The change may come by the growth of Socialism and the seizure of the doctrine of State despotism by masterful and ambitious minds to cloak an usurpation the ancient and known forms of which would not be tolerated, just as the Caesars, while avoiding the detested name and form of kingship, yet ruled Rome under the harmless titles of Princeps and Imperator, first man of the state and general, far more despotically than Tarquin could have done. Under whatever disguises the change may steal upon the people, one thing is certain that if Lord Morley and the Anglo-Indian proconsuls succeed in perpetuating absolutism in India, it will recoil from India to reconquer England. The Nationalists of this country are fighting not only for the liberties of India but for the liberties of England.

Liberty or Empire.

It is an ancient and perpetually recurring choice which is now being offered to the British people, the choice between liberty and empire. The two are incompatible except by the substitution of a free federation for a dominion. Rome was offered the choice. She won an empire and lost her liberty. External expansion has always been accompanied by a concentration of internal power in King or oligarchy. Athens, the only people who attempted to be imperial and despotic abroad and democratic at home, broke down in the attempt. In English history also we find that the great expansion in the eighteenth century led to the reactionary rule of the third George and it was not till England after the severe lesson in America adopted her present colonial system that expansion and democracy went hand in hand. That system was not an imperial system but a loose collection of free states only nominally united by the British Crown. The Indian problem is the test of British Liberalism. The colonial system as it stands cannot obtain between two States which are not mother and daughter. The one would not tolerate it; the other would not be content with it. But if England can bring herself to extend in a different form the principle of a collection of free States to India, she may keep her position in the world and her liberty together. Despotism and liberty she cannot keep; she must either yield up absolutism abroad or renounce liberty at home.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MY COUNTRYMEN.

The position of a public man who does his duty in India to-day, is too precarious to permit of his being sure of the morrow. I have recently come out of a year's seclusion from work for my country on a charge which there was not a scrap of reliable evidence to support, but my acquittal is no security either against the trumping up of a fresh accusation or the arbitrary law of deportation which dispenses with the inconvenient formality of a charge and the still more inconvenient necessity of producing evidence. Especially with the hounds of the Anglo-Indian Press barking at our heels and continually clamouring for Government to remove every man who dares to raise his voice to speak of patriotism and its duties, the liberty of the person is held on a tenure which is worse than precarious. Rumour is strong that a case for my deportation has been submitted to the Government by the Calcutta Police and neither the tranquillity of the country nor the scrupulous legality of our procedure is a guarantee against the contingency of the all-powerful fiat of the Government watchdogs silencing scruples on the part of those who advise at Simla. Under such circumstances I have thought it well to address this letter to my countrymen, and especially to those who profess the principles of the Nationalist party, on the needs of the present and the policy of the future. In case of my deportation it may help to guide some who would be uncertain of their course of action, and, if I do not return from it, it may stand as my last political will and testament to my countrymen.

The situation of the Nationalist party is difficult but not impossible. The idea of some that the party is extinct because its leaders are sentenced or deported, is an error which comes of looking only at the surface. The party is there, not less powerful and pervading than before, but in want of a policy and a leader. The first it may find, the second only God can give it. All great movements wait for their Godsent leader, the willing channel of His force, and only when he comes, move forward triumphantly to their fulfilment. The men who have led hitherto have been strong men of high gifts and commanding genius, great enough to be the protagonists of any other movement, but even they were not sufficient to fulfil one which is the chief current of a worldwide revolution. Therefore the Nationalist party, custodians of the future, must wait for the man who is to come, calm in the midst of calamity, hopeful under defeat, sure of eventual emergence and triumph and always mindful of the responsibility which they owe not only to their Indian posterity but to the world.

Meanwhile the difficulties of our situation ask for bold yet wary walking. The strength of our position is moral, not material. The whole of the physical strength in the country belongs to the established authority which our success would, so far as its present form is concerned, abolish by transforming it out of all possibility of recognition. It is natural that it should use all its physical strength to prevent, so long as it can, that transformation. The whole of the moral strength of the country is with us. Justice is with us, nature is with us, the law of God which is higher than any human justifies our action, youth is for us, the future is ours. On that moral strength we must rely for our survival and eventual success. We must not be tempted by any rash impatience into abandoning the ground on which we are strong and venturing on the ground on which we are weak. Our ideal is an ideal which no law can condemn, our chosen methods are such that no modern Government can expressly declare them illegal without forfeiting its claim to be considered a civilized administration. To that ideal and to those methods we must firmly adhere and rely on them alone for our eventual success. A respect for the law is a necessary quality for endurance as a nation and it has always been a marked characteristic of the Indian people. We must therefore scrupulously observe the law while taking every advantage both of the protection it gives and the latitude it still leaves for pushing forward our cause and our propaganda. With the stray assassinations which have troubled the country we have no concern, and, having once clearly and finally dissociated ourselves from them, we need notice them no farther. They are the rank and noxious fruit of a rank and noxious policy and until the authors of that policy turn from their errors, no human power can prevent the poison-tree from bearing according to its kind. We who have no voice either in determining the laws or their administration, are helpless in the matter. To deportation and proclamation, the favourite instruments of men incapable of a wise and strong rule, we can only oppose a steady and fearless adherence to the propagandism and practice of a lawful policy and a noble ideal.

Our ideal is that of Swaraj or absolute autonomy free from foreign control. We claim the right of every nation to live its own life by its own energies according to its own nature and ideals. We reject the claim of aliens to force upon us a civilisation inferior to our own or to keep us out of our inheritance on the untenable ground of a superior fitness. While admitting the stains and defects which long subjection has induced upon our native capacity and energy, we are conscious of that capacity and energy reviving in us. We point to the unexampled national vigour which has preserved the people of this country through centuries of calamity and defeat, to the great actions of our forefathers continued even to the other day, to the many men of intellect and character such as no other nation in a subject condition has been able to produce, and we say that a people capable of such unheard-of vitality is not one which can be put down as a nation of children and incapables. We are in no way inferior to our forefathers. We have brains, we have courage, we have an infinite and various national capacity. All we need is a field and an opportunity. That field and opportunity can only be provided by a national government, a free society and a great Indian culture. So long as these are not conceded to us, we can have no other use for our brains, courage and capacity than to struggle unceasingly to achieve them.

Our ideal of Swaraj involves no hatred of any other nation nor of the administration which is now established by law in this country. We find a bureaucratic administration, we wish to make it democratic; we find an alien government, we wish to make it indigenous; we find a foreign control, we wish to render it Indian. They lie who say that this aspiration necessitates hatred and violence. Our ideal of patriotism proceeds on the basis of love and brotherhood and it looks beyond the unity of the nation and envisages the ultimate unity of mankind. But it is an unity of brothers, equals and freemen that we seek, not the unity of master and serf, of devourer and devoured. We demand the realisation of our corporate existence as a distinct race and nation because that is the only way in which the ultimate brotherhood of humanity can be achieved, not by blotting out individual peoples and effacing outward distinctions, but by removing the internal obstacles to unity, the causes of hatred, malice and misunderstanding. A struggle for our rights does not involve hatred of those who mistakenly deny them. It only involves a determination to suffer and strive, to speak the truth boldly and without respect of persons, to use every lawful means of pressure and every source of moral strength in order to establish ourselves and disestablish that which denies the law of progress.

Our methods are those of self-help and passive resistance. To unite and organise ourselves in order to show our efficiency by the way in which we can develop our industries, settle our individual disputes, keep order and peace on public occasions, attend to questions of sanitation, help the sick and suffering, relieve the famine-stricken, work out our intellectual, technical and physical education, evolve a Government of our own for our own internal affairs so far as that could be done without disobeying the law or questioning the legal authority of the bureaucratic administration, this was the policy publicly and frankly adopted by the Nationalist party. In Bengal we had advanced so far as to afford distinct proof of our capacity in almost all these respects and the evolution of a strong united and well-organised Bengal had become a near and certain prospect. The internal troubles which came to a head at Surat and the repressive policy initiated immediately afterwards, culminating in the destruction of our organisations and the effective intimidation of Swadeshi workers and sympathizers by official underlings, have both been serious checks to our progress and seem for the moment to have postponed the realisation of our hopes to a distant future. The check is temporary. Courage and sane statesmanship in our leaders is all that is wanted to restore the courage and the confidence of the people and evolve new methods of organisation which will not come into conflict even with the repressive laws.

The policy of passive resistance was evolved partly as the necessary complement of self-help, partly as a means of putting pressure on the Government. The essence of this policy is the refusal of co-operation so long as we are not admitted to a substantial share and an effective control in legislation, finance and administration. Just as "No representation, no taxation" was the watchword of American constitutional agitation in the eighteenth century, so "No control, no co-operation" should be the watchword of our lawful agitation—for constitution we have none,—in the twentieth. We sum up this refusal of co-operation in the convenient word "Boycott", refusal of co-operation in the industrial exploitation of our country, in education, in government, in judicial administration, in the details of official intercourse. Necessarily, we have not made that refusal of co-operation complete and uncompromising, but we hold it as a method to be enlarged and pushed farther according as the necessity for moral pressure becomes greater and more urgent. This is one aspect of the policy. Another is the necessity of boycott to help our own nascent energies in the field of self-help. Boycott of foreign goods is a necessary condition for the encouragement of Swadeshi industries, boycott of Government schools is a necessary condition for the growth of national education, boycott of British courts is a necessary condition for the spread of arbitration. The only question is the extent and conditions of the boycott and that must be determined by the circumstances of the particular problem in each case. The general spirit of passive resistance has first to be raised, afterwards it can be organised, regulated and, where necessary, limited.

The first obstacle to our evolution is the internal dispute which has for the moment wrecked the Congress and left in its place the hollow and mutilated simulacrum of a National Assembly which met last year at Madras and, deprived though it is of the support of the most eminent local leaders, purposes to meet again at Lahore. It is a grievous error to suppose that this dispute hung only on personal questions and differences of a trifling importance. As happens inevitably in such popular contests, personal questions and differences of minor importance intervened to perplex and embitter the strife, but the real questions in debate were those which involved the whole future development of the spirit and form of self-government in this country. Were that spirit and form were determined or oligarchy? Were they to be constitutional in procedure or governed by arbitrary and individual choice and discretion? Was the movement to be progressive and national or conservative and parochial in its aims, policy and spirit? These were the real issues. The Nationalist party stood for democracy, constitutionalism, and progress. The Moderate party, governed by an exaggerated respect for old and esteemed leaders, helped, without clearly understanding what they did, those who stood for oligarchy, arbitrary procedure and an almost reactionary conservatism. Personal idiosyncracies, preferences, aversions settled like a thick cloud over the contest, the combatants on both sides flung themselves on every point of difference material or immaterial as a pretext or a weapon, the tactics of party warfare were freely used and, finally, the deliberate obstinacy of a few Moderate leaders in avoiding discussion of the points of difference and the unruly ardour of the younger men on both sides led to the violent scenes at Surat and the break-up of the Congress. If the question is ever to be settled to the advantage of national progress, the personal and minor differences must be banished from the field and the real issues plainly and dispassionately considered.

The questions of particular importance which divide the parties, are the exact form of Swaraj to be held forward as an ideal, the policy of passive resistance and the form of certain resolutions. The last is a question to be decided by the Congress itself and all that the Nationalists demand is that discussion shall not be burked and that they shall not be debarred from their constitutional right of placing their views before the National Assembly. On the other points, they cannot sacrifice their ideal or their policy, but their contention is that these differences ought not in a free deliberative assembly to stand in the way of united progress. The Swaraj matter can easily be settled by the substitution of "full and complete self-government" for "self-government on Colonial lines" in the Swaraj resolution. The difference as to passive resistance hinges at present on the Boycott resolution which the Nationalist party—and as this they are supported by a large body of Moderate opinion,—cannot consent to sacrifice. But here also they are willing to submit the question to the arbitrament of a freely-elected Congress, though they refuse to recognise a close and limited Subjects Committee as the final authority. It will be seen therefore that the real question throughout is constitutional. The body which at present calls itself the Congress, has adopted a constitution which is close, exclusive, undemocratic and so framed as to limit the free election of delegates by the people. It limits itself by proposing a number of articles of faith in a particular form of words to every intending delegate before he can take his seat; it aims at the election of delegates only by select bodies and associations instead of the direct election of the people; it excuses many from the chances of election and gives them an undue weight in the disposal of the affairs of the assembly. These and similar provisions no democratic party can accept. A Nationalist Conference or a Moderate Convention may so guard its integrity, but the Congress is and must be a National Assembly admitting freely all who are duly elected by the people. The proposed passing of this reactionary constitution by a body already limited under its provisions will not cure the constitutional defect. It is only a Congress elected on the old lines that can determine the future provisions for its constitution and procedure with any hope of universal acceptance.

It is not therefore by any manipulation of the Convention Congress that a solution of the problem can be brought about, but by the Provincial Conferences empowering the leaders of both parties to meet in Committee and provide for an arrangement which will heal differences and enable the Congress to work smoothly and freely in the future. If there is a minority who refuse to associate themselves with any such attempt, the majority will be justified by the mandate of the Provinces in disregarding them and meeting to carry out the popular wish. Once the lines are settled they can be submitted to the free choice of a freely-elected Congress for acceptance, rejection or modification. This will restore a Congress on sound constitutional lines in which the bitter experience of the past may be relied on to prevent those mistakes of obstinacy and passion which prevented a solution of the problem at Surat.

Outside the Congress the chances of united working are more complete than within it. There are only two questions which are likely either to trouble harmony or hamper action. The first is the question of the acceptance or rejection of the present reforms introducing, as they do, no element of popular control nor any fresh constitutional principle except the unsound principle of privileged representation for a single community. This involves the wider question of co-operation. It is generally supposed that the Nationalist party is committed to the persistent and uncompromising refusal of co-operation until they get the full concession of Swaraj. Nationalist publicists have not cared to combat this error explicitly because they were more anxious to get their ideal accepted and the spirit of passive resistance and complete self-help popularized than to discuss a question which was not then a part of practical politics. But it is obvious that a party advancing such a proposition would be a party of doctrinaires and idealists, not of practical thinkers and workers. The Nationalist principle is the principle of "no control, no co-operation." Since all control has been refused and so long as all control is refused, the Nationalist party preaches the refusal of co-operation as complete as we can make it. But it is evident that if, for instance, the power of imposing protective duties were given to a popular and elective body, no serious political party would prefer persistence in commercial boycott to the use of the powers conceded. Or if education were similarly made free of official control and entrusted to a popular body, as Lord Reay once thought of entrusting it, no sensible politician would ask the nation to boycott that education. Or if the courts were manned by Indian judges and made responsible not to the Executive but to a Minister representing the people, arbitration would immediately take its place as a supplementary aid to the regular courts. So also the refusal to co-operate in an administration which excludes the people from an effective voice does not involve a refusal to co-operate in an administration of which the people are an effective part. The refusal of autocratic gifts does not involve a refusal to take up popular rights inalienably secured to the people. It is on the contrary with the object of compelling the concession of the various elements of Swaraj by peaceful moral pressure and in the absence of such concessions developing our own institutions to the gradual extrusion and final supplanting of bureaucratic institutions that the policy of self-help and passive resistance was started. This acceptance of popular rights does not imply the abandonment of the ideal of complete autonomy or of the use of passive resistance in case of any future arbitrary interference with the rights of the people. It implies only the use of partial Swaraj as a step and means towards complete Swaraj. Where the Nationalists definitely and decisively part company with an influential section of the Moderates is in refusing to accept any petty or illusory concession which will draw away our aspirations from their unalterable ideal or delude the people into thinking they have secured real rights.

Another question is that of cleaving to and enforcing the Boycott. In Bengal, even if there are some who are timid or reactionary enough to shrink from the word or the thing, the general feeling in its favour is emphatic and practically unanimous. But it is time now to consider seriously the question of regulating the boycott. Nationalists have always demurred to the proviso "as far as possible" in the Swadeshi resolution on account of the large loophole its vagueness left to the hesitating and the lukewarm, and they have preferred the form "at a sacrifice." But it will now be well if we face the concrete problems of the boycott. While we must keep it absolute wherever Swadeshi articles are procurable as also in respect to pure luxuries with which we can dispense, we must recognize that there are necessities of life and business for which we have still to go to foreign countries. The public ought to be guided as to the choice of the countries which we shall favour in the purchase of these articles, necessarily they must be countries sympathetic to Indian aspirations, and those which we shall exclude. The failure to deal with this question is largely responsible for the laxity of our political boycott and our consequent failure to get the Partition rescinded. There are also other questions, such as the attempt of shopkeepers and merchants to pass off foreign goods wholesale as Swadeshi, which must be taken up at once if the movement is not to suffer a serious setback.

A final difficulty remains,—by what organization are we to carry on the movement even when these questions are settled? The Nationalist programme was to build up a great deliberative and executive organisation on the basis of a reconstituted Congress, and this scheme still remains the only feasible means of organising the country. Even if an united Congress cannot be secured, the provinces ought to organise themselves separately, and perhaps this may prove to be the only possible way of restoring the Congress, by reconstituting it from the bottom. Even the District organisations, however, cannot work effectively without hands, and these we had provided for in the Sabhas and Samitis of young men which sprang up on all sides and were just succeeding in forming an efficient network of organisation all over Bengal. These are now being suppressed by administrative order. It becomes a question whether we cannot replace them by a loose and elusive organisation of young men in groups ordering each its own work by common agreement and working hand in hand, but without a rigid or definite organisation. I throw out the suggestion for consideration by the leaders of thought and action in the provinces where unity seems at all feasible.

This then is the situation as it presents itself to me. The policy I suggest to the Nationalist party may briefly be summed up as follows:—

1. Persistence with a strict regard to law in a peaceful policy of self-help and passive resistance.
2. The regulation of our attitude towards the Government by the principle of "No control, no co-operation."

3. A rapprochement with the Moderate party wherever possible and the reconstitution of an united Congress.

4. The regulation of the Boycott movement so as to make both the political and the economic boycott effective.

5. The organisation of the Provinces if not of the whole country according to our original programme.

6. A system of co-operation which will not contravene the law and will yet enable workers to proceed with the work of self-help and national efficiency, if not quite so effectively as before, yet with energy and success.

KALIDASA'S SEASONS.

I.

ITS AUTHENTICITY.

The Seasons of Kalidasa is one of those early works of a great poet which are even more interesting to a student of his evolution than his later masterpieces. We see his characteristic gift even in the immature workmanship and uncertain touch and can distinguish the persistent personality in spite of the defective self-expression. Where external record is scanty, this interest is often disturbed by the question of authenticity, and where there is any excuse for the doubt, it has first to be removed. The impulse which leads us to deny authenticity to early and immature work, is natural and almost inevitable. When we turn from the great harmonies and victorious imaginations of the master to the raw and perhaps faltering workmanship of these uncertain beginnings, we are irresistibly impelled to cry out, "This is not by the same hand." But the impulse, however natural, is not always reasonable. The maxim that a poet is born and not made is only true in the sense that great poetical powers are there in the mind of the child, and in this sense the same remark might be applied with no less truth to every species of human genius; philosophers, sculptors, painters, critics, orators, statesmen are all born and not made. But because poetical genius is rarer or at any rate wider and more lasting in its appeal than any other, the popular mind with its ready gift for seizing one aspect of truth out of many and crystallising error into the form of a proverb, has exalted the poet into a splendid freak of Nature exempt from the general law. A man without the inborn oratorical fire may be trained into a good speaker, another without the master's inspiration of form and colour work out for himself a blameless technique, but so may a meagre talent become by diligence a machine for producing correct verse. Poetical genius needs experience and self-discipline as much as any other and by its very complexity more than most. This is eminently true of great poets with a varied gift. A narrow though a high genius works best on a single line and may show perfection at an early stage; but powerful and complex minds like Shakespeare or Kalidasa seldom find themselves before a more advanced period. Their previous work is certain to be full of power, promise and genius, but it will also be flawed, unequal and often imitative. This imperfection arises naturally from the greater difficulty in imposing the law of harmony of their various gifts on the bodily case which is the instrument of the spirit's self-expression.

To arrive at this harmony requires time and effort, and meanwhile the work will often be halting and unequal, varying between inspiration expressed and the failure of vision or expression. There is no more many-sided, rich and flexible genius in literature than Kalidasa's, and in his case especially we must be on our guard against basing denial of authenticity on imperfection and minor differences. We have to judge, first, by the presence or absence of the essential and indefinable self of Kalidasa which we find apparent in all his indubitable work, however various the form or subject, and after that on those nameable characteristics which are the grain and fibre of his genius and least imitable by others. In the absence of external evidence, which is in itself of little value unless received from definite and contemporary or almost contemporary sources, the test of personality is all-important; accidents and details are only useful as corroborative evidence; for these are liable to variation and imitation, but personality is a distinguishable and permanent presence as fugitive to imitation as to analysis. Even a slight fineness of literary palate can perceive the difference between the Nalodaya and Kalidasa's genuine work. Not only does it belong to an age or school in which poetical taste was debased and artificial, the poetical counterpart of those prose works for whose existence the display of scholarship seems to be the chief justification,—but it presents in this matter of personality and persistent characteristics no sufficient point of contact either with the Shacuntala or the Kumarasambhava or even with the House of Raghu. But in the Seasons Kalidasa's personality is distinctly perceived as well as his main characteristics, his force of vision, his architecture of style, his pervading sensuousness, the peculiar temperament of his similes, his characteristic strokes of thought and imagination, his individual and inimitable cast of description. Much of it is as yet in a half-developed state, crude consistency not yet fashioned with the masterly touch he soon manifested, but Kalidasa is there quite as evidently as Shakespeare in his earlier work, the Venus and Adonis or Lucrece. Defects which the riper Kalidasa avoids, are not uncommon in this poem,—repetition of ideas, use of more words than are absolutely required, haphazard recurrence of words and phrases not to produce a designed effect but from carelessness, haste or an insufficient vocabulary; there is moreover a constant sense of uncertainty in the touch and a frequent lack of finished design. The poet has been in too much haste to vent his sense of poetical power and not sufficiently careful that the expression should be the best he could compass. And yet, immature, greatly inferior in chastity and elegance to his best work, marred by serious faults of conception, bearing evidence of hurry and slovenliness in the execution, the Seasons is for all this not only suffused by a high though unchastened beauty, but marked with many of the most individual and essential features of Kalidasa's strong and exuberant genius. The defects are those natural to the early work of a rich sensuous temperament eagerly conscious of poetical power but not yet instructed and chastened.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT.—

The Government of India have now formally received the Indian Councils Act of 1909 and its text will be gazetted on Saturday next.

WAVES OF FEELING—

The Master of Elibank, speaking at Woodford, said that Lord Morley would do his duty, undeterred by criticism. He would deal drastically with those who were exciting disloyalty while themselves keeping in the background. It was necessary for the safety of the Empire that these rebellious agitations and waves of feeling should not be permitted to attain maturity.

DHINGRA'S SENTENCE.—

The Pioneer's London correspondent writes that a suggestion was made here after Dhingra's sentence, that penal servitude for life would probably serve as a more effective deterrent than hanging. While presenting the murderer's deflection as a martyr, Mr. W. T. Stead writing to the press, advocating the commutation, endorses this view and also speaks of the exercise of mercy. He argues that although Dhingra is pathologically sane his distorted views are necessarily those of a deranged mind.

SEVENTH OF AUGUST MEETING.—

"Justice" writes to the Bengalee. The anniversary of the birthday of the Swadeshi Movement is drawing near. It is time to discuss who should be the president of that important gathering. There are indeed many distinguished persons who may adorn the presidential chair, but my humble suggestion is that our most beloved Nationalist leader Babu Aurobinda Ghose should be offered the presidential chair. We all know how much he has suffered and that sacrifice he has made for us, but we in return have virtually done nothing for him. We have not had a single opportunity to honour him and to express our sincerest feelings. The opportunity has now come and we must not remain idle. I hope everyone will concur with me and combine his influence to make it a success and I have every reason to believe that this my appeal to my countrymen will not go in vain.

ANTI-PARTITION SWADESHI MEETING AT PANGSA.—

A grand anti-partition Swadeshi meeting was held on the 15th July at Pangsa, Faridpur. Over three thousand people, Hindus and Muslims, were present. People from many villages in the Goslundo sub-division and even from Kushtia, Kumarkhali, Jagati, Damukdia and Sara Ghat attended. Babu Aurobindo Ghosh, and Gispati Kavyatirtha arrived from Calcutta on the previous night. Babu Satish Chandra Mazumdar, Assistant Secretary to the District Association, and Babu Mathura Nath Dhar from Faridpur arrived in the morning. Mr. Giles with 15 police officers and some constables arrived Pangsa in the same train. A huge gathering at the railway station, repeatedly shouted Bande Mataram. Mr. Giles enquired and was informed that it was for Mr. Mazumdar who was expected. Nothing unpleasant happened. Mr. Giles was uninterfering. The meeting commenced at 3-30 p.m. Mr. Mazumdar, being unavoidably absent owing to a severe domestic misfortune the veteran Doctor Navadwip Chandra Paul presided. Resolutions strongly urging the modification of the partition and supporting Swadeshi were unanimously adopted. Pandit Gispati spoke strongly on both subjects. Babu Aurobindo Ghose addressed in English. The gratuitous warnings, given by the Magistrate and Police officers, were humourously criticised. Babu Satish Chandra Mazumdar, Mathura Nath Dhar, Kedareswar Dutt, M. Rowshanali Choudhury and many others addressed the meeting effectively. Sympathy was expressed for Mr. Mazumdar. The meeting lasted till 8 p.m. The President's attitude was firm and admirable. The meeting was a grand success. Great enthusiasm prevailed. All credit is due to Mr. Rowshanali Choudhury for the organization and the arrangements with the assistance of Babu Bireswar Lahiry. Besides the police officers over 300 chowkidars and duffadars were present.

SEVERATION AT ETAWAH.—

Mr. G. W. Dillon, M.A. of Etawah served the following notice on Mr. H. K. Gracey, I. C. S., Magistrate and Collector, Etawah, and Chairman of the District Board of Etawah:—I am instructed by Pandit Baleswar Prasad Miara, a resident of Etawah, now residing in Etawah City, to inform you that he intends to bring a civil suit against you, claiming damages to the extent of Rs. 25,000 on the expiration of two months from the date on which this notice under section 80 of Act V. 1908 is received by you. It appears that Pandit Baleswar Prasad, the intending plaintiff, was invited to a meeting of the Etawah District Board, to be held on the 28th June last. On Pandit Baleswar Prasad taking his seat there, you, in consultation with Babu Ram Prasad, Deputy Collector and Secretary to the Board, moved a resolution, suspending the said Baleswar Prasad from attending the meetings of the Board for a certain reason, stated therein, and that you caused the said resolution to be carried. Pandit Baleswar Prasad at once brought to your notice the fact that the resolution was altogether ultra vires and that he regarded it as deliberate insult to him who had been invited to attend the particular meeting, and that notwithstanding that this fact was brought to your notice you did not drop the resolution but went on with it and enforced it then and there with the sole object of humiliating and openly insulting the said Pandit Baleswar Prasad. I am instructed to say that your action on that occasion was actuated by the personal malice which you bear towards my client and that you took advantage of your position as a public officer to move this resolution, which was beyond the powers of the District Board and which you knew to be so. I am further instructed to say that on Pandit Baleswar Prasad representing this matter by telegram to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces the matter was referred to the Commissioner of the Agra Division who has been pleased to inform you that the resolution above referred to was in excess of the Board conferred by law and acting under section 42 (1) of the District Board Act he suspended its execution. I am instructed further to call upon you to tender to my client an unqualified apology and to pay Rs. 25,000 to him (to be made over to some charitable or educational institution) within six weeks from this date failing which a suit for damages for recovery of Rs. 25,000 would be filed against you in a court competent to entertain the same.

FATEJANGPUR MURDER CASE.—

Jitendra Nath Roy, alias Jitu Roy, who was arrested by the Calcutta police at Shambazar in connection with the Fatejangpur murder case, has been let off by Mr. Higgins, the Sub-divisional Magistrate as there was no evidence connecting him with the murder.

LORD CURZON AT SOUTHPORT.—

Lord Curzon, speaking at Southport criticised the Government for lack of firmness and strength in their policy in India.
There was now, he said, an open campaign of assassination. Criminals, glorying in crimes, wrote letters to newspapers, which ought not to be published. The present conspiracy might have been considerably checked, if it had been realized earlier.

MADAN LAL'S CASE.—

Old Bailey was crowded on the 23rd July when the trial of Madan Lal took place. Lord Alverstone presided. The prisoner appeared unconcerned. The Attorney General described the crime as long pre meditated with an obvious motive. Previous evidence was then repeated and the verdict of guilty was returned. Lord Alverstone in sentencing Manan Lal to death said that nothing he could say would have the slightest effect on the prisoner. After he had been sentenced, Madan Lal saluted in military fashion and said, "Thank you my Lord. I am glad to have the honour of dying for my country." Madan Lal was not defended and refused counsel.
His sole defence consisted in reading again his Police Court statement.

THE BOMBAY DOCKYARD THEFT CASE.—

The Government dockyard theft case, in which three European officers—Burn, Foreman, Inspector Henry, and Sub-Inspector Wilks, of the Bombay Police, stand charged with stealing Government property worth Rs. 500, which have been dragging on for two months, was concluded on 23rd July, the Magistrate reserving his judgment. Mr. Branson, in course of his address for the defence, amongst other things, regarding the conduct of the police said that the police made a deliberately false statement when they induced the Court to discharge Fernando and Shays. It there ever was any case which called for Government intervention and for searching inquiry into the manner in which it had been conducted and managed or rather mismanaged by the police, surely this was one. In Bengal apparently they were successful in inducing the Government to interfere and direct inquiries into the manner and customs of police there. At all events in this case they had got this circumstance established beyond all reasonable doubt in that over forty persons who were in a position to give evidence for or against the prosecution had been kept in what they might call custody or Nazad Kiad. These forty persons were assembled by the sounds of horn which was sounded every evening by the police men who went round to their respective dwelling houses and like obedient flock they came to the had police office and thence in congenial society of police they came together to this court and remained in it in the same congenial society, until the day was played out. That was in direct defiance of the provision of section 76 of the Bombay City Police Act which laid down that no complainant or witness should be required to accompany police on his way to court. He should like to know what would have been done to them if they had not accompanied the police to court.

THE INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST.

Tilak's Birthday.

A public meeting convened under the auspices of the Bombay National Union was held on Friday the 23rd July at the Rangh, Greenway, Bombay for the purpose of congratulating Sirjiut Bad Gangadhar Tilak on his fifty-fourth birthday. Mr. Joseph Pappas presided. The hall was crowded. Late Ganb Das a Panchayat orator, delivered a long speech on Hindustani celebrating Tilak. He said it was no disgrace or dishonour for a patriot to be jailed. He referred to Tilak's trial in a denunciatory tone, saying that their beloved patriot was snatched away from them by the verdict of a jury which did not understand the Marathi language in which the articles were written, and which was carried away by false translations. Lord Curzon had split the Bengalee nation into two pieces by the partition of Bengal, and to show that they loved their own dear land they must adopt the boycott. Tilak, actuated by pure love for the mother land wrote in support of Swadeshi and boycott. Tilak was their life and soul. Their hearts were bleeding on account of their enforced separation from him who was a great mahatma. Then the following resolution was carried. This public meeting congratulated Sirjiut Bad Gangadhar Tilak on his fifty-fourth birthday, and wishes him long life and prosperity, and hopes for the speedy release of the great Indian patriot and leader who is respected and loved all over the country. The Chairman in closing the proceedings, said that Tilak had taught the great lesson of suffering with pleasure. They must rejoice that he suffered for his country. A man who discouraged the highest ideals could never be a patriot. Tilak placed before them the high ideal of ultimate independence. He led them not to anarchy but to glory. He preached true patriotism and they should be proud to call Tilak their friend. He was adored by the whole country because of his love for his country. The meeting then dispersed late in evening with cries of "Bande Mataram" and "Tilak Maharaajki Jai."

THE KATHA UPANISHAD.

FIRST PART. SECOND CHAPTER.

1. Yama said. One thing is the good and quite another thing is the pleasant, yet both to different goals bind men to action. Of these he that taketh the good it is well for him, who chooseth the pleasant falleth from felicity.

2. Both the good and the pleasant come to a man and the steadfast soul looketh carefully at them and distinguisheth them; in his strength and wisdom he chooseth what is good rather than what is pleasant; but the fool chooseth the pleasant for his getting and for his having.

3. And then, Nachicatus, hast looked close at the objects of desire, at pleasant things and beautiful, and thou hast cast them from thee; thou hast not taken the path of riches which leads many men to perdition.

4. For apart are these, opposite, divergent, one called the Ignorance and the other the Knowledge. But Nachicatus, I deem truly desirous of the knowledge, whom so many delightful things could not make to lust after them.

5. They who dwell in the ignorance, wise in their own eyes and learned, fools are they that wander round in a circle like blind men led by the blind.

6. The childish wit bewildered and drunken with the illusion of riches cannot open its eyes to see the path to heaven; for he that thinks that this world is and there is no other, falleth again and again into death's thralldom.

7. God is not easy even to be heard of by many, and of those that hear of God not many can really know Him. A miracle is he that can speak of God wisely or attain him, and when one is found, a miracle is the listener who can know God even if taught of Him by the wisest Master.

8. An ordinary man cannot tell you of God; for thus told thou cannot truly know Him when He is thought of in many aspects. Unless told of Him by a supreme mind there is no way into His mystery; for He is subtler than subtlety and logic cannot reach Him.

9. This wisdom is not to be had by reasoning, O beloved Nachicatus, only when told thee by another it bringeth real knowledge,—the wisdom which thou hast gotten. Truly art thou faithful and steadfast, even such a questioner as thou art may I meet with always.

10. Nachicatus said, I know of great treasure that it is not for ever; for not by things fleeting shall one attain the one certain that endureth. Therefore I heaped the spiritual fire, the fire Nachicatus, and with perishable things I purchased the Imperishable.

11. Yama said. When thou hast seen in thy grasp, O Nachicatus, the possession of desire and foundation in the universe, yea, endlessness of power and the far shore of security and great riches and wide scope and firm foundation, strong in self-mastery thou didst cast them from thee.

12. Realising by attainment through spiritual yoga the secret ancient and inaccessible deity who in the recess of life is lodged, in the heart of things, in the cavern of being, the wise man banisheth from him joy and sorrow.

13. When a mortal man hath heard, when he hath understood, when he hath separated the Righteous One from his body and won that subtle Spirit, then he hath real joy, for then he hath got something to glory in. Wide open, I think, is the house of God to Nachicatus.

14. Nachicatus said. Tell me of that which thou hast seen other-where than in virtue and other-where than in unrighteousness.

otherwhere than in this chain of effects and causes, otherwhere than in the past and otherwhere than in the future."

15. Yama said. The goal whom all the Vedas glorify, whom all forms of austerity utter, for the desirableness of whom men practise holy living, of Him will I tell thee in briefest compass. Ours is that goal, O Nachikatus.

16. For this syllable is God, this syllable is the Most High. If one know this syllable, whatsoever he shall desire, it is his.

17. This anchor is the best this support is the highest; knowing this support one groweth great in in the heaven of the Spirit.

18. The Wise One within is not born, neither doth he die; He came not from anywhere, neither is He anyone, He is unborn and everlasting He is ancient and sempiternal, He is not slain with the slaying of the body.

19. If the slayer think that he slayeth and the slain think that he is slain, both of them know not; God within a man neither slayeth nor is slain.

20. Smaller than an atom, huger than hugeness the Spirit abideth hidden in the secret heart of this creature: when a man is stripped of wishes and weaned from sorrow, then he beholdeth the Spirit; purified from temperament he seeth God in His glory.

21. Seated He travelleth far and lying down He traverseth all the quarters. Who but I should know that Divine One who is joy and joylessness?

22. Having envisaged the Bodiless in bodies; the Stable in things unstable, having comprehended the great Lord the Omnipresent Self, the strong heart no more grieveth.

23. The Spirit is not to be won by teaching of the Scriptures, nor by brain power, nor by much learning, but He whom the Spirit chooseth, he getteth the Spirit and to him God discovereth His body.

24. None can win God who hath not ceased from doing evil, or who is passion-tossed, or divided in mind, or whose heart is not at rest; for it is by wisdom that one attaineth to Him.

SWADESHI IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY: AN ACCOUNT OF RECENT DEVELOPMENT:—II.

PENCIL, BUTTON, BRUSH AND HAT MANUFACTURES.

A Pencil Factory has quite recently been started at Dharwar by Mr. Kamalapurkar. The construction of buildings and the fitting up machinery do not seem to have been completed as yet.

The Poona Button Factory makes excellent buttons of horn, ivory and black wood for coats, jackets and shirts. These are well-made and will stand comparison with imported articles of the same description. Their prices too are moderate. A large quantity of buttons is consumed in the country and there is no reason why this enterprise should not be able to capture a portion of the market. Another buttons factory which is conducted on efficient and honest lines is the Western Manufacturing Company of Bombay.

The increasing number of mills, factories, planting presses, etc., in India has tempted a native firm at Bombay to establish a manufacturing plant to supply them with brushes. Messrs. Shah Bros. & Co. of Bombay, started a joint stock concern in 1906 which is at present carrying on business under the name of the Bombay Brush Manufacturing Company, Limited, at Apollo Street. It was proposed to conduct the work by hand at the outset, until the machinery arrived. The machinery, which was ordered through Messrs. Schroder, Schmidt & Co. of Bombay, was fitted up by the end of October last. The plant consists of an oil engine driving the various machines, which do away with a greater part of the manual labour. Brushes of all kinds and for all purposes manufactured here are said to compare favourably in price with imported articles.

The India Felt Topper Manufacturing Company, Bombay. An extensive Felt Cap Factory was opened only a few months ago by Messrs. Thanawala and Company, at Parel, Government Gate Road, Bombay. Hats manufactured there from raw wool are in no way inferior in quality to those imported from Turkey or Hungary. Messrs. Janardan and Sivasdas Saraf, Seth Thanawala and his two brothers are employed on fixed salaries in the Factory. Mr. Janardan, the Gujarathi expert learned the manufacturing processes in Europe. This Swadeshi Company, perhaps the first of its kind, have already found a good market for their manufactures. It is hoped the Mahomedan brethren will lend forth the Fez caps of this purely Indian Company in place of those imported from Austria and Hungary. This Company seems to have been started in response to the agitation originally started in European Turkey to boycott Austrian Fez caps, which travelled into India and was caught up by the Indian Mahomedans of the Western Presidency in particular.

SODA AND COTTON-SEED OIL MANUFACTURES.

The Pioneer Alkali Works.—This Factory was recently opened at Mahim in the Bombay Presidency to manufacture Soda used for washing purposes. It is under the able management of Mr. G. N. Potdar, I. A., a passed Chemical Engineer from the Imperial University of Tokio, in Japan. The soda manufactured is largely consumed in the Presidency, being used in cotton-presses. Clothes are said to be thoroughly cleansed in half an hour in a mixture of 3 to 4 per cent soda and hot water. The soda manufactured by the Pioneer Alkali Works is said to be in no way inferior to imported articles.

We hope the promoters of the Alkali Works of the Bombay Presidency will keep an eye on the other parts of India where foreign made soda has invaded many village homes, driving out the indigenous saji or other local washing materials.

The Navaneeta Oil Manufacturing Company.—This Company has been lately started at Surat under the supervision of Prof. Gajjar, the distinguished scientist of Bombay and of Messrs. Manekji Jethabhai Wardhamana & Co. of the same place with the main object of manufacturing oil from cotton-seeds, ground-nuts, etc., by purifying them by chemical processes, the oil purified being usable for culinary purposes.

Another cotton-seed oil-manufacturing company was started in September, 1900 at Broach under the title of the Nerbudda Cotton Seed Crushing Co., with a capital of a lakh of rupees. The mill agents, Messrs. Girdharlal Roychand & Co., have themselves taken up a third of the invested capital and propose to work the mill on a commercial basis, reserving for themselves a certain percentage as commission on profits alone. The agents are hopeful of a return of eight to twelve per cent to the shareholders. The mill plant will be capable of yielding six tons of oil daily, and in addition to the oil the cotton seed cakes will be about 12 tons in weight. We are not in a position to state how far this Company has proceeded with the actual operations.

In America there are at least 400 cotton seed oil mills, while in India there are but a few and these conducted on a meagre scale. The necessity of starting cotton oil-mills, however, is now being recognised in other parts of India; and the above two mills started by our Bombay brethren will no doubt serve as object-lessons to those whose eyes have not yet been opened to the great loss India is sustaining by exporting oil-seeds to foreign countries on a huge scale.—The Denon.

THE RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION.

Speech by S. J. Aurobindo Ghose
at Howrah.

(Annual meeting of Howrah People's Association.)

Well, we have been losing these things which were part of our associated life. But on the other hand we looked at the civilised nations of the West who are rushing upon us and breaking our society to pieces, and we saw that in those nations there were other centres of association, other means of uniting together. However imperfectly we began to seize upon them and try to use them, our life in the nineteenth century was a weak and feeble life. It had no ideals, no mighty impulses behind to drive or uplift it. It was bewildered and broken by the forces that came upon it; it did not know how to move and in what direction to move. It tried to take whatever it could from the life of the rulers. It strove to take their political associations and develop that principle of association. But our political associations had a feeble life bound together only by a few common interests which by ineffective means they tried to establish or protect. Political association among us led to very little action, for it was an association which looked mainly to others for help and did not look to the sources of strength within. These and other kinds of associations which we then tried to form tended mainly in one direction. They were institutions for the exchange of thought, associations for the spread of knowledge, by which we instinctively but imperfectly tried to encourage and express the growing idea that was within us. This was the one real value of most of our political associations. Then there came the flood of national life, the mighty awakening which appeared first in Bengal. The principle of association began to take a new form, it began to assume a new life. It no longer remained a feeble instrument for the expression of the growing idea within us, it began to become an instrument indeed.

It began to become a power. How did this new kind of association grow and to what objects did it address itself? The movement was not planned by any human brain, it was not foreseen by any human foresight. It came of itself, it came as a flood comes, as a storm comes. There had been slow preparations which we did not institute or understand. These preparations were mainly among the young men, the rising generation, the hope of India. There the spirit first awoke. At first it was not what we would call an association; it was only a temporary union of young men for a temporary cause. They called themselves by a name which has since become terrible to many of our friends of the Anglo-Indian Press. They called themselves volunteers. For what did they volunteer? They volunteered for service to the representatives of the nation who came together to deliberate for the good of the people. This is how it first came, as an idea of service, the idea of service to those who worked for the motherland. Out of that grew the idea of service to the Mother. That was the first stage and the root from which it grew into our political life. Then there was another stream which rose elsewhere and joined the first. Our Anglo-Indian brothers to whom we owe so much and in so many ways, did us this service also that they always scoffed at us as weaklings, men who were doomed to perpetual slavery and had always been a race of slaves because the people of Bengal had no martial gift, because they are not physically strong, because whoever chooses to strike them can strike and expect no blow in return. Therefore they were unfit for self-government, therefore they must remain slaves for ever.

Our Anglo-Indian friends do not proclaim that theory now. They have changed their tone. For the spirit of the nation could bear the perpetual reproach no longer, the awakening Brahman within our young men could bear it no longer. Associations grew up for physical exercise and the art of self-defence and grew into those Sanities which you have seen flourishing and recently sup pressed. We were determined to wash the blemish away. If this was the blemish, to be weak, if this was the source of our degradation we determined to remove it. We said, "In spite of our physical weakness we have a strength within us which will remove our defects. We will be a race of brave and strong men. And that we may be so, we will establish everywhere these associations for physical exercise." That, one would think, was an innocent object and had nothing in it which anyone could look upon with suspicion. In fact we never thought that we should be looked upon with suspicion. It is the Europeans who have trumpeted physical culture as a most valuable national asset, the thing in which the English speaking nations have preeminently excelled and which was the cause of their success and energy. That was the second seed of association.

There was a third seed and it was the thing for which our hearts yearned, the impulse towards brotherhood. A new kind of association came into being. That was the association which stood by labour and service and self-sacrifice, whose object of existence was to help the poor and nurse the sick. That was the flowering out of the Hindu religion. That was what Swami Vivekananda preached. That was what Aswini Kumar Dutta strove to bring into organised existence. That was what the Ramakrishna Mission, the Little Brothers of the Poor at Barisal tried to effect. This was the third way in which the new association established itself, the third seed of union, the third stream of tendency seeking fulfilment. All these streams of tendency came together, they united themselves and have been in their broad unifying current the glory of our national life for the last three years. The duties of young men by labour, by toil for the country, worship of the motherland held themselves together and spread the habit of association and the growth of brotherhood over the land. That is their quiet ideal and that the way in which these associations have been established.

These are the associations which have now been crushed out of existence under a charge which cannot be and has not been maintained, a charge which has been disproved over and over again. It is a monstrous charge. The charge is that these associations are associations of hatred and violence, associations for rebellion and disunity. That is the charge under which these associations have been suppressed. I have come recently back from Barisal. While I was there I heard and read something of the work of the young men's association in Barisal, the association called the Swadesh Bandhab Samiti which with its network covered the whole district of Backergunge. This association grew out of a much smaller association started by Aswini Kumar Dutta called the Little Brothers of the Poor. What was the work commenced by these Little Brothers of the Poor? When epidemic broke out, when cholera appeared in all its virulence, the young men of the Barisal Brajamohan College went out in bands. They nursed the sick, they took charge of those who had been abandoned, they took up in their arms those whom they found lying on the roadside. They were not deterred in those moments by the prejudice of caste or by the difference of creed. The orthodox Brahmin took up in his bosom and nursed the Mahomedan and the Namasandra. They did not mind the epidemic or fear to catch the contagion. They took up and nursed them as brother nurses brother and thus they rescued many from the grasp of death. Aswini Kumar Dutta is in exile. How did he establish that influence which caused him to be thought dangerous? By philanthropy, by service. While ordinary colleges under the control of the Government were mere soulless machines where they cram a few packets of useless knowledge into the brain of the student, Aswini Kumar breathed his own lofty and noble soul into the Brajamohan College and made it an engine indeed out of which men were turned, in which hearts and souls were formed. He breathed his noble qualities into the young men who grew up in the cherishing warmth and sunlight of his influence. He made his college an institution which in the essentials of education was a model for any educational institution in the world. This is how he built up his influence among the educated class. They followed him because he had shaped their souls between his hands. It is therefore that they loved him, it is therefore that they saw no fault in him. His influence among the common people was built up by love, service and philanthropy. It was out of the seed he planted that this Swadesh Bandhab Samiti grew.

What was the work of this Samiti, the existence of which could no longer be tolerated in the interests of the peace and safety of the Empire. First of all it continued with that blessed work which the Little Brothers of the Poor had begun, nursing, serving, saving the poor, the sick and the suffering. They made it their ideal to see that there was no sick man or sick woman of however low a class or depressed a caste, of whom it could be said that they went unhelpt in their sickness in the Backergunge district. That was the first crime the association committed.

The second crime was this. These young men went from house to house seeking out the suffering and the hungry when famine broke out in the country. To those who were patiently famishing they brought succour, but they did more. There were many people who belonged to the respectable classes on whom the hand of famine was laid. They would not go for help to the relief works; they would not complain and show their misery to the world. The young men of Barisal sought out these cases and secretly, without injuring the feelings of the suffering, they gave help and saved men and women from starvation. This was the second crime of the Swadesh Bandhab Samiti.

Then there was another. The social life of Bengal is full of discord and quarrels. Brother quarrels with brother and quarrels with bitter hatred. They carry their feud to the lawcourts; they sin against the Mother in themselves and in others; they sow the seed of lasting enmity and hatred between their families. And beyond this there is the ruin, the impoverishment of persistent litigation. The young men of the Swadesh Bandhab Samiti said, "This should not be tolerated any more. We will settle their differences, we will make peace between brother and brother. We will say to our people, 'If there is any dispute let us try to settle it first. If you are dissatisfied with our decision you can always go to the lawcourts; but let us try first.'" They tried, and hundreds of cases were settled out of court and hundreds of these seeds of enmity and hatred were destroyed. Peace and love and brotherhood began to increase in the land. This was their third crime.

Their fourth offence is a great crime nowadays. These young men had the hardihood to organise and help the progress of Swadeshi in the land. There was no violence. By love, by persuasion, by moral pressure, by appeals to the Samaj and the interests of the country, they did this work. They helped the growth of our industries; they helped it by organising the condition for their growth, the only condition in which these infant, these feeble and languishing industries can grow, the general determination to take our own goods and not the goods of their others, to give preference to our Mother and not to any stranger. In no other district of Bengal, in no other part of India was Swadeshi so well organised, so perfectly organised, so peacefully and quietly organised as in Barisal. That was the last and worst crime they committed. For these crimes they have been proclaimed, they have been forbidden to exist. This Swadesh Bandhab Samiti carried organisation to a perfection which was not realised in other districts because it is not every district which can have an Aswini Kumar Dutta or a Satia Chander Chatterji. But the same impulse was there, the same tendencies were there. I do not know any single society of the kind in Bengal which has not made some attempt to help the people in times of famine or to bring succour to the sick and suffering or to remove quarrels and discord as well as to help the growth of Swadeshi by organising that exclusive preference to which we have given the name of Boycott. These were general offences, common crimes.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Police Bill.

The Police Bill has passed the Committee and next week, it is rumoured, will be made law. It is a provision for giving absolute power to the Police Commissioner and his underlings. It is true that the power is limited in time in certain respects, but so long as it lasts it is arbitrary, absolute, without checks and, practically, without appeal. We hear that the present Police Commissioner resents any proposal to put a check on his absolute power as a personal insult. If so, he is in good company, for he only follows the example of that great philosopher and democratic statesman, Lord Morley, who resents democratic criticism of his measures and actions as a crime and sacrilege and a petty amendment of the present provisions for the deportation of inconvenient persons as a vote of censure. The spirit of absolutism fostered by arbitrary Government in India is not only swallowing up the old British virtues in India itself but encroaching on the free spirit of England. The powers of prohibition, regulation and arrest provided for in the Bill will exalt Mr. Halliday into the Czar of Calcutta. It is noticeable that any man may be arrested for the breach of any law by any policeman without a warrant and be sentenced to a fine of a hundred rupees or, for certain political offences among others, to a month's hard labour. Any meeting can be stopped for a week at the sweet will and discretion of an individual. The provisions for search and entry of the police into houses and so called public places are so ample as to give a power of inquisition and domiciliary visit second only to the Russian. Even boardings, messes and private lodging-houses are liable to entry at any hour and on any pretext. And by an inspired improvement on the stringent Bombay Act no action of the police, however vexatious, unwarranted and malicious, can be punished unless the aggrieved party can prove bad faith, a condition which in nine cases out of ten of malicious harassment is impossible of satisfaction. It is a sound principle that where a citizen has been causelessly harassed, the burden of proving good faith rests on the harasser. An opposite proviso means the destruction of the liberty of the person. No man's personal freedom and dignity will henceforth be safe for a moment from the whims of the lowest policeman in the street. The authorities may say that this is not the purposed object of the Bill. We have nothing to do with the intention of the framers, we have to do only with the provisions of the law itself, and it is enough if all these things are rendered possible under the provisions. To make bad laws and plead good intentions is an old evasion of weak and violent rulers.

The Political Motive.

That there is a political motive behind the Bill, any child can see and to conceal it only the most flimsy precautions have been taken. The prohibition of public meetings can have no reference to any but Swadeshi meetings, the reference to objectionable cries is obviously aimed at the national cry of Bande Mataram and the power of harassing under the pretext of regulation public processions and meetings can have no objective but the revived meetings and processions which have shown that the national movement was not dead but only suspended. Other provisions of the Bill may be dictated by the sole object of strengthening the hands, already overstrong, of the Calcutta Police in keeping order, but the nature and wording of these provisions coupled with the amazingly comprehensive definition of "public place" leave us no option but to see the obvious political motive behind. It is possible for the Police Commissioner under these provisions to paralyze every legitimate form of public activity in the city of Calcutta. It is no use sheltering un-the provisions of the Bombay Act. The Bombay Act has been used to paralyze public activity of a kind inconvenient to the Government in that city. What, moreover, was the necessity of suddenly resorting to the stringency of the Bombay Act at this particular juncture. It is not alleged that any of the meetings or processions recently organized were disorderly or led to disturbance or public inconvenience. The only fresh emergency was the political.

A Hint from Dinajpur.

The Amrita Bazar Patrika notices a case from Dinajpur which may give a few hints to Sir Edward Baker if he really wants or is wanted to establish police autocracy in Calcutta. Mr. Gurlek there justified the caning of witnesses and accused by the police as a necessary "method of examination" without which the administration of justice in this country cannot be carried on. He says "I daresay the police frequently quicken the witness' answers with a cut from their riding canes. Such methods of examination are no doubt to be deprecated but without them I do not suppose the police would get any information at all". The case will come up before the High Court and we await with interest the view that authority will take of this novel legal dictum. Meanwhile why should not Sir Edward Baker take time by the forelock and, after a now familiar method, validate such "methods" beforehand by a clause in his Police Bill empowering any policeman to cut with a cane any citizen whom he may fancy guilty of breaking any law so as to persuade him to desist? Of course the said policeman will not be liable to punishment unless it can be proved that he cut in bad faith.

The Swadeshi Steam Navigation Company.

We publish elsewhere an appeal from the promoters of the enterprise which first encouraged Indian energy and capital into the new path many are now preparing to follow. This Company, as the pioneer, had to face all the difficulties of a novel enterprise of considerable magnitude and it has suffered more than others from competition supported by official sympathy. To Nationalists it will be sufficient to recall the name of Chittabaram Pillai, condemned to a long term of imprisonment on the strength of police reports, and the plucky struggle made by the Company against overwhelming odds. The Company represents an output of patriotic effort and self-sacrifice such as no other has behind it and it would be a public disgrace if its appeal went unheard.

A Swadeshi Enterprise.

One of the great weaknesses of the Swadeshi movement at present is the ease with which, under the stress of necessity, we admit articles as Swadeshi which are to all intents and purposes foreign. It is always therefore an encouraging sign when a real Swadeshi enterprise is started which liberates us from the necessity of such humiliating compromises, especially when they affect articles of daily necessity. We take for an instance what we choose to call Swadeshi umbrellas although these are Swadeshi only so far as the labour of fitting the parts together is concerned. Sardar Rajmachikar of Poona and his brother have done a service to Swadeshi by starting a factory in which all the parts except the iron ribs and stretchers are either made in the factory or, in the matter of the cloth, procured from Poona and Bombay mills. The only drawback is the high prices of these articles compared with the cheapness of the fractionally Swadeshi umbrellas. This we believe, is largely due to the high prices of the cloth produced from the Bombay mills, but the people of Bombay and Poona are taking these umbrellas by the thousand in spite of the difference. We hope Bengal will be as patriotic in this small but important matter. The prices will come down as soon as a sufficient market is created. Meanwhile we must take the Swadeshi article at a sacrifice as we have pledged ourselves to do by any number of vows and resolutions. To replace foreign by indigenous in the objects of daily use is the very lifebreath of Swadeshi.

YOUTH AND THE BUREAUCRACY.

Sir Edward Baker is usually a polite and careful man and a diplomatic official. It is not his fault if the policy he is called upon to carry through is one void of statesmanship and contradictory of all the experience of history. Neither is it his fault if he lacks the necessary weight in the counsels of the Government to make his own ideas prevail. He carries out an odious task with as much courtesy and discretion as the nature of the task will permit and, if we have had to criticise severely the amazing indiscretion foreign to his usual habits which he was guilty of on a recent occasion, it was with a recognition of the fact that he must have forgotten himself and spoken on the spur of the moment. But as the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy is now constituted, Sir Edward's personal superiority to his two predecessors is of no earthly use to us. We acknowledge the politeness and self-restraint of the wording in his recent advertisement to the educational authorities and the public at large of the inadvisability of allowing students to mix in the approaching Boycott celebration. But his reserve of language cannot succeed in blinding the public, still less the parties addressed, to the real nature of this promulgation. To parties circumstanced like the authorities of the Bengal Colleges official or private it is one of those hints which do not differ from orders. The whole Calcutta University has been placed under the heel of the Executive authority and no amount of writhing or wry faces will save Principals and Professors from the humiliating necessities proper to this servile and degraded position. They have sold themselves for lucre and they must eat the bitter bread of their self-chosen servitude. If they are asked to do the spy's office or to be the instruments for imposing on young men of education and respectability restrictions unexampled outside Russia, it is not theirs to reject the demand instantly as freemen would indignantly reject such degrading proposals. They must remember that the affiliation of their colleges and the grants which alone can enable them to satisfy the arduous conditions of affiliation depend on the fiat of those who make the demand. These things are in the bond. For the rest, the unwisdom of the wise men and the imprudence of the prudent who stopped the students' strike is becoming more and more apparent. Prudence and wisdom for the proprietors of private schools, for the country it was the worst imprudence and unwisdom. It has turned the training ground of our youth into a means of restraining the progress of our people and denying them that liberty which the other nations of the world enjoy. An university in which the representatives of academic culture are only allowed to keep their position on condition of forfeiting their self-respect and the pen of the pedagogue supplements the baton of the policeman, is no longer worth keeping.

But there are other considerations affecting a wider circle than the educational world, which arise immediately out of this notice. Ever since the beginning of this movement the opponents of progress have with an admirable instinct hit upon the misleading and intimidation of the youth of this country as the best means of thwarting the movement. Their direct attempts having failed, they are now trying to keep down the rising spirit of young India by objurgations addressed to the guardians and by playing on their selfishness and fears. Once the National Education movement was thwarted of its natural course and triumphant success by the leaders, it was easy for the bur-eanerats to enforce this policy by gathering up all the authority of the Universities into their hands and using it as a political lever. The loss of education and a career, —this was the menace which they held over the guardians and young men of the country and by the continual flourishing of this weapon they have succeeded in putting back for a while the hour of our national fulfilment. The unwholesome and dangerous effects of denying the aspirations of youth a peaceful outlet, as dangerous to the government as they are unwholesome to the country, the arbiters of official policy in spite of their experience are too blind to realize. Bad leadership, bad because marred by selfishness and timidity, has aided the political experience and insight of the English rulers in inflicting upon the cause a check which still works to hamper us in our progress. We do not propose to waste space by answering the sophistries which our opponents advance to cover their interested suggestions. It is enough to say in answer that in all civilised countries young men are freely permitted to take part in politics and their want of interest in the chief national activity would be considered a mark of degeneration. It is not the arguments of adversaries but their own personal and class interests which actuate those among us who at the bidding of Anglo-Indians official or unofficial deter our young men from attending public meetings or mixing in the national movement. To these also we can say nothing. Men who can prefer the selfish gratification of their transitory individual needs and interests to the good of the nation are not needed in the new age that is coming. They are there only to exhaust a degraded and backward type which the world and the nation are intended soon to outgrow. If some of them still pose as men of weight and leading, it is only for a moment. They will vanish and the whole earth heave a sigh of relief that that type at least is gone for ever.

But to the young men of Bengal we have a word to say. The future belongs to the young. It is a young and new world which is now under-process of development and it is the young who must create it. But it is also a world of truth, courage, justice, lofty aspiration and straightforward fulfilment which we seek to create. For the coward, for the self-seeker, for the talker who goes forward at the beginning and afterwards leaves his fellows in the lurch there is no place in the future of this movement. A brave, frank, clean-hearted, courageous and aspiring youth is the only foundation on which the future nation can be built. This seventh of August in this year 1909 is not an ordinary occasion. It is a test, a winnowing-fan, a separator of the wheat and the chaff. Because it is so, Sir Edward Baker has been inspired by an overruling Providence to publish his notification and the authorities of colleges to act according to their kind. The question is put not to these but to the young men who are asked under pain of academical penalties to abstain from an activity which is both their right and their duty. Let them remember that they disobey no law of the land and no provision of morality if they attend the celebration of the new nation's birthday. They will only disobey what professes to be an exercise of school discipline, but is nothing of the kind. It does not fall within the province of a school-master to dictate what shall be the political opinions or activities of his pupils, nor are College professors concerned with what their students may do outside the precincts of College and hostel in the hours of their lawful liberty, so long as there is no infringement of law or morality. The attempt is an usurpation of the rightful authority of guardians or, in the case of those who have come of age, of their right to govern their own personal action. There only remains the question of self-interest. That is a point we leave to their hearts and consciences, whether they shall prefer their own interests or their country's. But if once they decide for the nobler part, let them stand by the choice they have made. God does not want flatterers and flinchers for his work, nor does he want unstable enthusiasts who cannot maintain the energy of their first movements. Secondly, let them not only stand by their choice but stand by their comrades. Unless they develop the corporate spirit and the sense of honour which refuses to save oneself by the sacrifice of one's comrades in action when that sacrifice can be averted by standing together, they will not be fit for the work they will have to do when they are a little older. Whatever they do let them do as a body, whatever they suffer let them suffer as a body, leaving out the coward and the falterer but, once they are compact, never losing or allowing anything to break that compactness. If they can act in this spirit, heeding no unpatriotic counsels from whatever source they come, then let them follow their duty and their conscience, but let them do nothing in a light even if fervent enthusiasm, moving forward without due consideration and then showing a weakness unworthy of the nation to which they belong and the work to which they have been called.

KALIDASA'S SEASONS.

II.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE POEM

Kalidasa's Seasons is the first poem in any literature written with the express object of describing Nature. It is precisely similar to its aim to a well-known eighteenth-century failure in the same direction, Thomson's Seasons. The names tally, the forms corresponds, both poems adopting the plan of devoting a canto to each season, and the method so far agrees that the poets have attempted to depict each season in its principal peculiarities, scenes and characteristic incidents. But here all parallel ends. Wide as the gulf between the genius of one of the greatest world-poets and the talent of the eighteenth-century versifier is the difference between the gathered strength and compact force, the masterly harmonies and the living truth of the ancient Indian poem and the diffuse artificiality and rhetoric of the modern counterpart. And the difference of spirit is not less. The poet of a prosaic and artificial age when the Anglo-Saxon emerged in England and got himself Gallicised, Thomson was unable to grasp the first psychological laws of such descriptive poetry. He fixed his eye on the object but he could only see the outside of it. Instead of creating he tried to photograph. And he did not remember or did not know that Nature is nothing to poetry except in so far as it either a frame, setting or ornament to life or else a living presence to the spirit. Nature interpreted by Wordsworth is a part of his own and the universal consciousness, by Shakespeare is an accompaniment or note in the orchestral music of life, by more modern poets as an element of decoration in the living world-picture is possible in poetry; as an independent but dead existence it has no place either in the world itself or in the poet's creation. In his relations to the external, life and mind are the man, the senses being only instruments, and what he seeks outside himself is a response in kind to his own deeper reality. What the eye gathers is only important in so far as it is related to this real man or helps this expectation to satisfy itself. Kalidasa with his fine artistic feeling, his vitality and warm humanism and his profound sense of what true poetry must be, appears to have divined from the beginning the true place of Nature in the poet's outlook. He is always more emotional and intellectual than spiritual, like Shakespeare to whom he has so many striking resemblances. We must not expect from him the magical insight of Valmiki, still less the spiritual discernment of Wordsworth. He looks inside but not too far inside. But he realises always the supreme importance of life as the only abiding foundation of a poem's immortality.

The first canto is surcharged with the life of men and animals and the life of trees and plants in summer. It sets ringing a note of royal power and passion and promises a poem of unexampled vigour and interest. But to ring variations on this note through six cantos seems to have been beyond the young poet's as yet limited experience and narrow imaginative mastery. He fell back on the life of sensuous passion with images of which, no doubt, his ungoverned youth was most familiar. But instead of working them into the main thought he turned to them for a prop and, when his imaginative memory failed him, multiplied them to make up the deficiency. This lapse from artistic uprightness brought its own retribution, as all such lapses will. From one error indeed Kalidasa's vigorous and aspiring temperament saved him. He never relaxed into the cloying and effeminate languor of sensuous description which offends us in Keats' earlier work. The Malavas with all their sensuousness, luxury and worship of outward beauty were a masculine and strenuous race, and their male and vigorous spirit is as prominent in Kalidasa as his laxer tendencies. His sensuousness is not coupled with weak self-indulgence but is rather a bold and royal spirit seizing the beauty and delight of earth to itself and compelling all the senses to minister to the enjoyment of the spirit rather than enslaving the spirit to do the will of the senses. The difference perhaps amounts to no more than a lesser or greater force of vitality, but it is for the purposes of poetry a real and important difference. The spirit of delightful weakness swooning with excessive beauty gives a peculiar charm of soft laxness to poems like the Endymion, but it is a weakening charm to which no virile temperament will trust itself. The poetry of Kalidasa satisfies the sensuous imagination without enervating the virile chords of character: for virile energy is an unfailing characteristic of the best Sanscrit poetry, and Kalidasa is inferior to none in this respect. His artistic error has nevertheless had disastrous effects on the substance of his poem.

It is written in six cantos answering to the six Indian seasons, Summer, Rain, Autumn, Winter, Dew and Spring. Nothing can exceed the splendour and power of the opening. We see the poet revelling in the yet virgin boldness, newness and strength of his genius and confident of winning the kingdom of poetry by violence. For a time the brilliance of his work seems to justify his ardour. In the poem on Summer we are at once seized by the marvellous force of imagination, by the unsurpassed closeness and clear strenuousness of his gaze on the object; in the expression there is a grand and concentrated precision which is our first example of the great Kalidasian manner and an imperial power, stateliness and brevity of speech which is our first instance of the high classical diction. But this canto stands on a higher level than the rest of the poem. It is as if the poet had spent the best part of his force in his first enthusiasm and kept back an insufficient reserve for the sustained power proper to a long poem. The decline in energy does not disappoint at first. The poem on Rain gives us a number of fine pictures with a less vigorous touch but a more dignified restraint and a graver and nobler harmony, and even in the Autumn, where the falling off of vigour becomes very noticeable, there is compensation in a more harmonious finish of style, management and imagery. We are led to believe that the poet is finding himself and will rise to a finale of flawless beauty. Then comes disappointment. In the next two cantos Kalidasa seems to lose hold of the subject; the touches of natural description cease or are, with a few exceptions, perfunctory and even conventional, and the full force of his genius is thrown into a series of extraordinary pictures, as vivid as if actually executed in line and colour, of feminine beauty and sensuous passion. The two elements, never properly fused, cease even to stand side by side. For all description of the winter we have a few stanzas describing the cold and the appearance of fields, plants, waters in the wintry days, by no means devoid of beauty but wanting in vigour, closeness of vision and eagerness. In the poem on Dew the original purpose is even fainter. Perhaps the quietness of these seasons, the absence in them of the most brilliant pictorial effects and grandest distinctive features, made them a subject uninspiring to the unripeness and love of violence natural to a richly-endowed temperament in its unschooled youth. But the Spring is the royal season of the Indian year and should have lent itself peculiarly to Kalidasa's unborn passion for colour, sweetness and harmony. The closing canto should have been the crown of the poem. But the poet's sin pursues him and, though we see a distinct effort to recover the old pure fervour, it is an effort that fails to sustain itself. There is no falling off in harmonious splendours of sound and language, but the soul of inspired poetic observation ceases to inform this beautiful mould and the close fails and languishes. It is noticeable that there is a double close to the Spring, the two versions having been left, after the manner of the old editions, side by side. Kalidasa's strong artistic perception must have suffered acutely from the sense of failure in inspiration and he has accordingly attempted to replace the weak close by an improved and fuller cadence. What is we may presume, the rejected version, is undoubtedly the weaker of the two but neither of them satisfies. The poem on Spring which should have been the finest, is the most disappointing in the whole series.

THE KATHA UPANISHAD.

FIRST PART. THIRD CHAPTER.

1. Yama said. "There are two that drink deep of the truth of works well done in this world: they are lodged in the heart of the creature and in the highest half of the most high is their dwelling. As of light and shade God-knowers speak of them and those who heap the five fires of the householder and those who kindle thrice the fire Nachicatus.

2. We have power to kindle the fire Nachicatus who is a bridge to the offerers of the sacrifice and is that which is the most high and Brahman imperishable and the far shore of security to voyagers over this Ocean.

3. Know the body for a chariot and the soul for the master of the driving, the lower mind for the reins and the higher mind for the charioteer who driveth.

4. The senses are the steeds of the soul and the objects of their action are the paths in which they gallop: for there is one who is yoked with soul and mind and senses, and he is that which enjoyeth, say the thinkers.

5. Now he that is without knowledge and his mind is ever out of yoga, his senses are to him as wild horses that will not hearken to the calling of the driver.

6. But he that hath knowledge and his mind is ever in Yoga, his senses are to him as noble steeds that hearken to the driver.

7. He that is without knowledge and has no mastery of his mind and is ever unclean, reacheth not his goal but goeth astray into the world of phenomena.

8. But he that hath knowledge and is master of his mind and keepeth himself pure always, reacheth that goal of all whence a man is not born again.

9. That man who useth the lower mind for the reins and the higher mind for the driver, reacheth the end of his long road, even that highest home of Vishnu.

10. Than the senses their objects are higher; and beyond the objects of sense is the lower mind; and beyond the lower mind is the higher mind; and beyond the higher mind is the Mighty Spirit.

11. And higher than the Mighty One is the Unmanifest and higher than the Unmanifest is the Purusha. Than the Purusha there is none higher. He is the most high, He is the summit of our going.

12. This is a secret Spirit in all creatures and maketh not Himself obvious; yet is He seen by the seers of the subtle through a subtle and perfect higher mind.

13. Let the wise man imprison speech in his mind, and mind in his self that is knowledge, and knowledge in his world-self and that again in the peaceful and utter Spirit.

14. Arise ye, awake, learn quickly, finding out the great ones who have the knowledge; for sharp as a razor's edge, difficult of going, hard to traverse is that path say the seers.

15. That which is beyond sound and beyond touch, beyond shape and beyond abatement, beyond taste and beyond smell, eternal and It has no beginning and It is without end, immutable, higher than the Mighty That having seen from the jaws of death thou art delivered.

16. The man of large power who speaketh or heareth the story of Nachicatus wherein Death was the speaker, the sempiternal story, shall grow great in the heaven of the spirit.

17. He who being pure reciteth this high and secret thing at the time of the savdha in the assembly of the Brahmins, prepareth himself for infinity, for infinity he prepareth.

PROLOGUE.

—ooo—

A wide interminable forest. Most of the trees are sals, but other kinds are not wanting. Treetop mingling with treetop, foliage melting into foliage, the interminable lines progress; without crevice, without gap, without even a way for the light to enter, league after league and again league after league the boundless ocean of leaves advances, tossing wave upon wave in the wind. Underneath, thick darkness; even at midday the light is dim and uncertain; a seat of terrific gloom. There the foot of man never treads, there except the illimitable rustle of the leaves and the cry of wild beasts and birds, no sound is heard.

In this interminable, impenetrable wilderness of blind gloom, it is night. The hour is midnight and a very dark midnight, even outside the woodland it is dark and nothing can be seen. Within the forest the piles of gloom are like the darkness in the womb of the earth itself.

Bird and beast are utterly and motionlessly still. What hundreds of thousands, what millions of birds, beasts, insects, flying things have their dwelling within that forest, but not one is giving forth a sound. Rather the darkness is within man.

gination, but inconceivable is that noiseless stillness of the ever-murmurous, ever noise-filled earth. In that limitless empty forest, in the solid darkness of that midnight, in that unbreakable silence there was a sound "Shall the desire of my heart ever be fulfilled?"

After that sound the forest reaches back again into stillness. Who would have said then that a human sound had been heard in those wilds? A little while after the sound came again, again the voice of man rang forth troubling the hush, "Shall the desire of my heart ever be fulfilled?"

Three times the wide sea of darkness was thus shaken. Then the answer came, "What is the stake put down?"

The first voice replied, "I have staked my life and all its riches."

The echo answered, "Life! it is a small thing which all can sacrifice."

"What else is there? What more can I give?"

This was the answer, "Thy soul's worship."

AN APPEAL

The Swadeshi Steam Navigation Company Limited hardly needs any introduction to the public. Its creation and struggle for existence are part of Indian history. It was the first attempt on any large industrial scale to challenge the monopoly by foreign capital of the waterways of India. Taken up at a time when there was no previous experience to guide the projectors, it has fought a losing fight against great odds handicapped by the mistakes inseparable from a novel attempt, assisted only by the newly awakened patriotism of the country; and in spite of all it has survived and with some fresh help from that patriotism, will be able to resume its activity free of obstacles, instructed by experience and confident of success.

Our difficulties have been manifold. The British Indian Steam Navigation Company was in sole possession of the field and attempted by a great reduction of rates a temporary loss which their established position enabled them to afford to crush their infant rival. Our worth was burdened with the heavy handicap of having to pay up in periodical instalments the purchase money of our vessels, so that, the collection of shares being also behind hand, we had to keep the business going without the necessary working capital. Finally, one of our vessels, the S. S. Gallia had long to be idle while fresh boilers were fitted.

These difficulties have now been removed or can be faced. The purchase money has been paid up and the company starts again clear of this incubance. The boilers of S. S. Gallia are ready and will soon be fitted. As for the rival company, its efforts to strangle the infant company have only revealed where our strength lies. Experience has shown that our merchants decidedly preferred the Swadeshi line even when our cargo rates were two or three times as high as the abnormally reduced rates of our rivals. It has also shown that, though the passenger traffic under the present disadvantageous circumstances has possibilities of loss as well as gain, the coasting traffic brings in sure and large profits. Even the passenger service can be made profitable in the face of the difficulties, if we can start with sufficient advantage in the matter of capital and an assured profit in other directions, so as to afford the necessary facilities to the passengers who are otherwise attracted to the rival line.

To take advantage of these favourable circumstances and get rid of those which are still unfavourable, it is necessary to have

- (1) a regular coasting service from Calcutta to Calcutta.
- (2) a daily service between Colombo and Tuticorin.
- (3) Fresh outlay so as to increase our fleet to meet these demands.
- (4) A substantial working capital.

The Company started in the 16th October 1906 with a proposed capital of 10 lacs divided into 40,000 shares of 25 rupees each. Of these nearly 34,000 shares have been applied for and allotted. The Company has at present 2 steam ships and a steam launch. It is necessary to add at present to this small nucleus a vessel of our own and chartered steamer. The Company has resolved to raise a debenture loan of 3 lacs of rupees and issued for the purpose. 300 debentures of Rs. 1000 each and it has in addition increased its capital from 10 to 20 lacs divided into 80,000 shares of Rs. 25 each. If a hundred of the wealthy men of India were to take up one debenture each and four thousands of the middle class were to take each one share, we should be able to start of our business with an absolute certainty of success.

In addition to the good the Company is doing by its work to national development and its pioneer work in the past, it offers training to young men from various parts of India in Navigation and ship-building on condition of serving for some years in the company's fleet. Is it too much to expect that the Pioneer Steam Navigation Company financed, managed and run by Indians will easily command the small amount of additional support required from our countrymen? The hope of our rival is that the company will fail to command the funds necessary for its undertakings and that, after its extinction, they will be able to recover their monopoly and recoup the losses the competition has inflicted on them. Repeated prophecies have been made of our collapse. The Company has survived them all and it only needs this assistance from our countrymen to end the competition in our favour, and disappoint for ever the hopes of those who exploit our industry and commerce and seek to preserve their monopoly.

We appeal to the country at large not nearly as a profitable financial concern, but as a national undertaking whose success will be the symbol of a great patriotic victory. By our past and our future we belong not merely to Madras but to all India and from all India we look for the support for which we make this appeal.

THE LONDON MURDERS.

EVIDENCE BEFORE THE MAGISTRATE.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, JULY 16.

MADAN LAL DHINGRA was charged with the wilful murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie and Dr. Lalceca at the Westminster Police Court, and was committed to take his trial. Sitting by Mr. Horace Smith, the Magistrate, were Sir Edward Bradford and Sir Charles Mathews, Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. A. H. Bodkin, who prosecuted for the Director of Public Prosecutions, said that on January 26th of the present year, the prisoner went to Hatton Garden Post Office, and obtained a licence to carry a revolver. Then he purchased at Gamage's very powerful Colt revolver, and this was the one used on July 1st, the date of the tragedy. The prisoner had regular practice with this weapon at an establishment at Tottenham, and obtained a considerable degree of proficiency. On the evening of July 1st, he was at this place, and had the weapon cleaned and returned to him. In addition to this revolver, the prisoner had another of Belgian make and a dagger. Documents and photographs found on the prisoner and at his lodgings made it clear that Dhingra for some time before July 1st premeditated some terrible crime with a revolver, and with regard to his action on July 1st, he gave some opinions which he had formed as to the position of India, which clearly threw a light upon the reasons which actuated him.

Sir Lesley Probyn said as he was about to leave the Imperial Institute on the evening of the 1st, he heard several shots fired, and saw prisoner holding a revolver. Again it was fired, and instantly the prisoner turned it round and put it to his temple. The witness rushed at him and caught his two hands and managed to get hold of the revolver, and he retained possession of it until he fell. Other gentlemen came to his assistance. He remembered Mr. Sinha, an Indian gentleman, did so. Sir Lesley Probyn added that he injured his nose and ribs through falling.

Asked if he desired to question the witness, the prisoner replied "I object to the use of the word murder. It was a thing that any Englishman would have done and was quite justified."

Mr. Madan Sinha, an Indian law student repeated the evidence he gave at the inquest. "This man is a traitor to my country," said the prisoner as Mr. Sinha's evidence was read over.

Mr. D. W. Thorburn, journalist, gave similar testimony.

Captain Charles Rolleston said he took some papers from Dhingra. One document was a foolscap sheet folded in four.

Mr. Morley, of "Fun-Land," Tottenham Court Road, said he had a rifle and pistol range. He recognised the prisoner as a young man who had been practising at the range for two or three months. He always used his own pistol and ammunition. On the evening of July 1st, the prisoner was at the range and fired twelve shots at one of the ordinary targets. Before he left he asked that his pistol might be cleaned. The target the prisoner used on the occasion of his last visit was produced. There were 11 hits, and seven or eight of these could be covered by a man's hand.

Dr. Thomas Neville, Police Surgeon, said he saw the prisoner at the Walton Street Police Station on the night of July 1st. His condition was normal. He was not hurt in any way, and did not want the services of a doctor.

Mrs. Harris, the landlady of 108, Ledbury Road, said that on July 1st the prisoner left the house about 2 in the afternoon, and returned at 6. Between seven and eight he went out again wearing his turban.

Detective Sergeant Eveliegh said that the pistol taken from the prisoner by Sir Lesley Probyn contained an unspent cartridge. The magazine held eight cartridges and another could be put in the chamber. The second pistol which was found in the prisoner's pocket contained six cartridges in the magazine. In the prisoner's pocket were five cartridges. The Detective Inspector said he searched the prisoner's room and found a number of cartridges and a spare pistol magazine containing seven cartridges. In a locked box was a statement on foolscap paper, and it was almost identical in language to the one previously referred to, which was found on the prisoner.

Detective Inspector MacBrain deposed to finding a cabinet photograph in the prisoner's room. This was produced but was kept face downwards. It was a portrait of Sir Curzon Wyllie.

Mr. Horace Smith, in committing the accused, gave the customary caution. The prisoner made the following statement:—

"I do not want to say anything in defence of myself but simply to prove the justice of my deed. As for myself no English law court has got any authority to arrest and detain me in prison or pass sentence of death on me. That is the reason I did not have any counsel to defend me. And I maintain that as it is patriotic in an Englishman to fight against the Germans if they were to occupy this country, it is much more justifiable and patriotic in my case to fight against the British. I hold the English people responsible for the murder of 80 millions of Indian people in the last 50 years and they are also responsible for taking away lb. 100,000,000 every year from India to this country. I also hold them responsible for the hanging and deportation of my patriotic countrymen who did just the same as the English people here are advising their countrymen to do. And the Englishman who goes out to India and gets say lb. 1000 a month, that simply means that he passes a sentence of death on a thousand of my poor countrymen because three thousand people could easily live on this £1000, which the Englishman spends mostly on his frivolities and pleasures. Just as the Germans have no right to occupy this country so the English people have no right to occupy India, and it is perfectly justifiable on our part to kill the Englishman, who is polluting our sacred land. I am surprised at the terrible hypocrisy, the farce, and the mockery of the English people. They pose as the champions of oppressed humanity, the peoples of the Congo and the peoples of Russia when there is terrible oppression and horrible atrocities committed in India. For example, the killing of two millions of people every year and the outraging of our women. In case this country is occupied by Germans, and an Englishman, not bearing to see the Germans walking with the insolence of conquerors in the streets of London, goes and kills one or two Germans, that Englishman is held as a patriot by the people of this country. Certainly I am prepared to work for the emancipation of my Motherland. Whatever I have to say is in the paper before the Court. I make this statement not because I wish to plead for mercy or any thing of that kind. I wish that English people should sentence me to death, for in that case the vengeance of my countrymen will be all the more keen. I put forward this statement to show the justice of my cause to the outside world, and especially to our sympathisers in America and Germany."

The prisoner was then removed. Throughout the lengthy pleading he had maintained an exceedingly calm demeanour.

JUDICIARY VS. EXECUTIVE.

A tension of feeling between the High Court and the Executive in Travancore has occurred. The High Court, it will be remembered acquitted all the accused in the recent riot case and ordered the arrest and prosecution of the Assistant Superintendent of Police. A charge was also brought against eight policemen for giving false evidence and for suppression of evidence. Though the offence was non-bailable yet these men were admitted to bail by the local first class Magistrate. The High Court quashed the bail and ordered the immediate re-arrest of the policemen who were released on bail, and while rejecting petitions to elucidate the charge, strongly animadverted on the indifference on the part of the Executive since it was two and a-half months since the prosecution was ordered by the High Court.

MR. KEIR HARDIE AND INDIA.

A writ for alleged slander has been served on Mr. Cresswell, Unionist Candidate for Mid-Derby, at the instance of Mr. Keir Hardie. Mr. Keir Hardie, in the course of a speech at Wolverhampton this week, replying to an interruption respecting India, said "I have received, while sitting here, a report of a meeting addressed by Mr. Cresswell in which he said that I have said the Labour Party wanted to help the people of India to get rid of a system which is wringing the life blood out of them, just as the industrial system is wringing the blood out of the white people at Home. He makes the statement that by speeches in India I have fed the sedition movement which has culminated in the murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie. I have stood this kind of thing until I can stand it no longer, and I give this intimation that when I return to London I shall give Mr. Cresswell the opportunity of proving his statement in the Law Courts of the land. Every ear in England barked at my heels twenty years ago when the man and his message were unknown, but they cannot do it today with impunity."

PANDIT SAMADHAYI'S CASE.

The case in which Pandit Mokshada Chaitan Samadhai was charged with having harboured dacoits, and in which the inevitable approver was secured has ended in the Pandit's acquittal. The Jury returned an unanimous verdict of not guilty, and the Judge acquitted the accused. Now what about the approver and the organisers of the trial.

THE LONDON MURDERS.

The letter which appeared in the press on "The Extremist Attitude" has drawn a long reply from Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, who says: "If to condemn the official repression which has been the psychological cause and origin of the various acts of violence in Bengal be a crime, I plead guilty to it and challenge to be brought to trial for it. If to found and edit the Rande Mataram be a crime, I cannot help pleading guilty to it also. But it is significant that no prosecution was started against this paper so long as I was in charge of it, though it openly declared absolute autonomy as the Nationalist ideal. In India, as elsewhere, I have nothing to alter and amend in anything that I have written and said during the last five or six years. If these opinions are criminal why was I not prosecuted for them? I have never been hauled up for sedition even in India, where almost anything can be construed as such. My photo has, I hear, recently been proscribed by an Indian judge as seditious, but the original yet stands uncondemned."

SEDITION IN SVARAJ.

Ganesh Balwant Modak, Agent Vartman Agency, was arrested on the 29th July by Mr. Vincent, Deputy Commissioner of Police, on a charge of publishing seditious articles which appeared in the Svaraj of Babu Bipin Chandra Pal. The accused was placed before the Chief Magistrate the next day. Mr. Tuljaparker, pleader, applied for bail, but the Public Prosecutor objected. Mr. Tuljaparker contended that the issue of the Svaraj in question was received by the accused on the 20th instant and the accused was not aware of its contents. They were examined by the Customs authorities before they were delivered to the accused. His Worship ordered the accused to be released on bail of Rs. 1,000 and one surety for like amount of bail. Rs. 500 were ordered to be deposited in Court in cash. Two cart loads of papers, documents, magazines were secured by the police in virtue of the warrant. Mr. Vincent, Deputy Commissioner of Police, asked the Court's permission to examine them. The accused applied that he should be allowed to be present at the examination. The Magistrate granted permission to Mr. Vincent as also to the accused. The case is adjourned.

ALLKORD SEDITION IN BOMBAY.

The case in which Ganesh Balwant Modak of the Vartman News Agency stands charged with the publication of seditious matter, came on for hearing on the 4th August before the Chief Magistrate. The charge is in connection with the circulation of the Svaraj edited by Babu Bipin Chandra Pal in London. The Public Prosecutor in opening the case drew the Court's attention to the double summer number of the Svaraj and reading the fly leaf which explained the object of the pamphlet, laid special emphasis on the portion referring to honest nationalist journal. He admitted that Hindu Nationalist Agency, as gathered from the prospectus, included intention of emitting literature in England which would not be allowed in India. After referring to the accused's connection with Svaraj, the Public Prosecutor added, it was the article "Etiology of bomb in Bengal" that the prosecution objected to. It was an apology for the use of bomb and contained many suggestions inimical to British Government. The writer of the article suggested that Government had raised Mahomedans against the Hindus. Comparison was drawn between Russian and Indian conditions and the use of bombs was practically justified. The article began softly by saying that there was no justification for bombthrowing in Bengal any more than there was for it in Russia, but later on, the writer went on to say that bomb was a necessary fruit of Russian autocracy. Bomb was mad out to be the weapon of the utterly helpless Europeans and Indians were compared in the article much to the detriment of the former. The general tenor of the article was against British Government and calculated to excite race hatred between some classes of His Majesty's subjects in India. The case was adjourned.

BOYCOTT AGITATION.

The following notification appeared in this week's "Calcutta Gazette":—
In view of the announcement of political meetings to be held in connection with the forthcoming celebration of the anniversary of the boycott, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor considers it opportune to invite the special attention of the Heads of Colleges and Schools, and of all parents and guardians, to the inexpediency of permitting students and schoolboys to take part in such gatherings. In Sir Edward Baker's opinion it is most undesirable that immature minds could be subjected to the excitement and disturbance which are inseparable from political agitation, and he believes that this view is shared by all right thinking men. His Honour trusts, therefore, that all who are responsible for the education and behaviour of students and schoolboys will use their influence to induce them to abstain from taking part in, or from being present at, any form of political demonstration.

SRĒJUT ARAVINDA GHOSE.

(From Svaraj)

The youngest in age among those who stand in the forefront of the Nationalist propaganda in India but in endowment, education, and character, perhaps, superior to them all—Aravinda Ghose is distinctly marked out by Providence to play in the future of this movement a part not given to any of his colleagues and contemporaries. The other leaders of the movement have left their life behind them: Aravinda has his before him. Nationalism is their last love: it is Aravinda's first passion. They are burdened with the cares and responsibilities of large families or complex relations. Aravinda has a small family and practically no cumulative obligations. His only care is for his country—the Mother, as he always calls her. His only recognised obligations are to her. Nationalism, at the best, a concern of the intellect with some, at the lowest a political cry and aspiration with others, is with Aravinda the supreme passion of his soul. Few, indeed, have grasped the full force and meaning of the Nationalist ideal as Aravinda has done. But even of these very few—though their vision may be clear, their action is weak. Man cannot, by a fiat of his will, at once recreate his life. Our Karma follows us with relentless insistence from day to day and from death to death. To see the vision of truth and yet not to be possessed by that supreme passion for it which burns up all other desires and snaps asunder, like ashen bands, all other ties and obligations—this is the divine tragedy of most finer natures. They have to cry out with St. Paul at every turn of life's tortuous path—"The Spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." But blessed are they for whom this tragic antithesis between the ideal and the real has been cancelled: for whom to know the truth is to love it, to love the truth is to strive after it, and to strive after the truth is to attain it: in whom there is no disparity, either in time or degree, between the idea and its realisation—in whom the vision of the ideal, by its own intrinsic strength at once attunes every craving of the flesh, every movement of the mind, every emotion of the heart, and every impulse of the will—to itself: who have to strive for its realisation, not within, but without: who have to struggle not with their own Self but with the Not-Self, who have to fight and conquer not themselves but others, in order to establish the Kingdom of God realised by them in the relations of their own inner life, in the outer actualities and appointments of the life of their own people or of humanity at large. These are, so to say, the chosen of God. They are born leaders of men. Commissioned to serve special ends affecting the life and happiness of large masses of men, they bear a charmed life. They may be hit, but cannot be hurt. They may be struck, but are never stricken. Their towering optimism, and the Grace of God, turn every evil into good, every opposition into a help, every loss into a gain. By the general verdict of his countrymen, Aravinda stands today among these favoured sons of God.

Birth is not an accident. Accident of birth—is the language of infidel empiricism. Nature has no room for accidents in her schemes. It is only man's inability to trace her secrets that has coined this word to cover his ignorance. Man's birth is no more an accident than the rise and fall of tides. There can really be no accidents in evolution, the law of natural selection has killed their chance altogether. But does the operation of natural selection start only after the birth of the organism or does it precede it? Is it only a biological, or also a psychological law? Like the problems of biology, those of psychology also are inexplicable, except on this theory. The inference is irresistible that there is such a thing as natural selection even in the psychic plane. The spirit, by the impulse of its own needs, must choose and order the conditions of its own life even as the physical organism does. This is the psychic significance of heredity. Life from this point of view is not a lottery, but a matter really of determined choice. The needs of the organism supply the organs in the lower kingdom: the desires of the heart collect and create their necessary equipment and environment for the human being. On no other hypothesis can the riddle of the human life be explained more satisfactorily. It may not explain everything, but it explains many things absolutely un-understandable and inexplicable on any other hypothesis. This at least has been the Hindu view from time immemorial. A crude intuition at first, it became a settled conviction with the people subsequently, with a fundamental philosophy of causation behind it. And this theory stands curiously verified in Aravinda Ghose.

Two strong currents of thoughts, ideals, and aspirations met together, and strove for supremacy in Bengal, among the generation to which Aravinda's parents belonged. One was the current of Hindu Nationalism—of the revived life, culture and ideals of the nation that had lain dormant for centuries and had been discarded as lower and primitive by the first batch of English-educated Hindus, especially in Bengal. The other was the current of Indo-Anglicism—the onrushing life, culture and ideals of the foreign rulers of the land, which, expressing themselves through British law and administration on the one side, and the new schools and universities on the other, threatened to swamp and drown the original culture and character of the people. The two stocks from which Aravinda sprang represented these two conflicting forces in the country. His maternal grandfather, Raj Narayan Bose was one of the makers of modern Bengal. A student of David Hare, a pupil of De Rozario, an alumnus of the Hindu College, the first English college that had the support of both the Hindu community and the British rulers of the Province, Raj Narayan Bose started life as a social and religious reformer. But while he caught as fully as any one else among his contemporaries, the impulse of the new illumination, he did not lose so completely as many of them did, his hold on the fundamental spirit of the culture and civilisation of his race. He joined the Brāhmo-Samāj, under Maharshi Debendra Nāth Tagore, but felt repelled by the denational spirit of the later developments in that movement under Keshub Chunder Sen. In fact, it is difficult to say, to which of its two leaders—Debendra Nath or Rāj Nārāyan, the Adi or the older Brahmo Samaj, as it came to be called after Keshub Chunder Sen seceded from it and established the Brahmo-Samaj of India—was more indebted for its intense and conservative nationalism. But it may be safely asserted that while Debendra Nath's nationalism had a dominating theological note, Raj Narayan's had both a theological and social, as well as a political emphasis. In him, it was not merely the spirit of Hinduism that rose up in arms against the onslaught of European Christianity but, the whole spirit of Indian culture and manhood stood up to defend and assert itself against every form of undue foreign influence and alien domination. While Keshub Chunder Sen pleaded for the recognition of the truths in the Hindu scriptures side by side with those in the Bible, Raj Narayan Bose proclaimed the superiority of Hinduism to Christianity. While Keshub Chunder has been seeking to reconstruct Indian, and specially Hindu, social life, more or less after the British model, Raj Narayan's sturdy patriotism and national self-respect rebelled against the enormity, and came forward to establish the superiority of Hindu social economy to the Christian social institutions and ideals. He saw the on-rush of European goods into Indian markets, and tried to stem the tide by quickening what we would now call the Svadeshi spirit, long before any one else had thought of it. It was under his inspiration that a Hindu Mela, or National Exhibition, was started a full quarter of a century before the Indian National Congress thought of an India Industrial Exhibition. The founder of this Hindu Mela was also the first Bengallee who organised gymnasia for the physical training of the youths of the nation. Stick and sword plays, and others ancient but decadent sports and pastimes of the people that have come into vogue recently, were originally revived at the Hindu Mela, under Raj Narayan Bose's inspiration and instruction. Raj Narayan Bose did not openly take any part in politics, but his writings and speeches did a good deal to create that spirit of self-respect and self-assertion in the educated classes that have since found such strong expression in our recent political activities.

A strong conservatism, based upon a reasoned appreciation of the lofty spirituality of the ancient culture and civilisation of the country; a sensitive patriotism, born of a healthy and dignified pride of race; and a deep piety expressing itself through all the varied practical relations of life—these were the characteristics of the life and thought of Raj Narayan Bose. He represented the high-water-mark of the composite culture of his country—Vedantic, Islamic, and European. When he discoursed on Brahma-Jnan or Knowledge of the God, brought to mind the ancient Hindu gnostics of the Upanishads. When he cited verses from the Persian poets, filling the ear with their rich cadence—with his eyes melting in love and his mobile features aglow with a supreme spiritual passion—he reminded one of the old Moslem devotees. And when he spoke on the corruptions of current religion, or the soulless selfishness of modern politics, he appeared as a nineteenth century rationalist and iconoclast of Europe. In his mind and life he was at once a Hindu Maharishi, a Moslem Sufi, and a Christian theist of the Unitarian type; and like Ram Mohan Roy, the founder of the Brahmo-Samaj, of which Raj Narayan Bose was for many years the honoured president, he also seems to have worked out a synthesis in his own spiritual life between the three dominant world-cultures that have come face to face in modern India. Like Ram Mohan, Raj Narayan also seems to have realised in himself, intellectually and spiritually, that ideal of composite nationhood in India, which the present generation has been called upon to actualise in the social, economic, and political relations of their country. Raj Narayan Bose was also an acknowledged leader in Bengalee literature. A writer in the "Modern Review" (Calcutta) calls Raj Narayan Bose the "Grandfather of Indian Nationalism." He was Aravinda's maternal grandfather; and Aravinda owes not only his rich spiritual nature, but even his very superior literary capacity to his inherited endowments from his mother's line.

If his maternal grandfather represented the ancient spiritual forces of his nation, Aravinda's father, Dr. Krishnadhan Ghose, represented to a very large extent the spirit of the new illumination in his country. Dr. Ghose was essentially a product of English education and European culture. A man of exceptional parts, he finished his education in England, and taking his degree in medicine, entered the medical service of the Indian Government. He was one of the most successful Civil Surgeons of his day, and, had his life been spared, he would have assuredly risen to the highest position in his service open to any native of India. Like the general body of Indian young men who came to finish their education in England in his time, Kristadhan Ghose was steeped in the prevailing spirit of Anglicism. Like all of them, he was a thoroughly Anglicised Bengalee, in his ways of life. But unlike many of them, underneath his foreign clothing and ways he had a genuine Hindu heart and soul. Anglicism distorts Hindu character, cripples, where it cannot kill, the inherited altruism of the man, and makes him more or less neglectful of the numerous family and social obligations under which every Hindu is born. Like the original Anglo-Saxon, his Indian imitation also lives first and foremost for himself, his wife and children; and though he may recognise the claims of his relations to his charity, he scarcely places his purse at their service as an obligation. But Kristadhan Ghose was an exception. Though he affected the European's way of living, he never neglected the social obligations of the Hindu. His purse was always open for his needy relations. The poor of the town, where he served and lived, had in him a true friend and a ready help. In fact, his regard for the poor frequently led him to sacrifice to their present needs the future prospects of his own family and children. He had his sons educated in England; and so great was his admiration for English life and English culture that he sent them out here even before they had received any schooling in their own country. But his charities made such constant and heavy inroad into his tolerably large income, that he could not always keep his own children living in England, provided with sufficient funds for their board and schooling. Sons of comparatively rich parents they were brought up almost in adject poverty in a friendless country where wealth counts so much, not only physically, but also intellectually and morally. Keen of intellect, tender of heart, impulsive and generous almost to recklessness, regardless of his own wants, but sensitive to the suffering of others—this was the inventory of the character of Dr. Kristadhan Ghosh. The rich blamed him for his recklessness, the man of the world condemned him for his absolute lack of prudence, the highest virtue in his estimation. But the poor, the widow and the orphan loved him for his selfless pity, and his soulful benevolence.

THE RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION.

(SPEECH BY SJ. AUROBINDO GHOSH AT HOWRAH.)

But there was another thing that led to the suppression. This was an association that had that very dangerous and lethal weapon called the lathi. The use of the lathi as a means of self-defence was openly taught and acquired, and if that was not enough there was the imagination of a very highly imaginative police which saw hidden behind the lathi the bomb. Now nobody ever saw the bombs. But the police were quite equal to the occasion; they thought there might be bombs. And what if there were not? Their imagination was quite equal to realising any bomb that could not be materialised, —in baitakkhanas and elsewhere. The police suspected that the lathi was the father of the bomb. Their procedure was simple with the simplicity of the highest detective genius. When they hold of a respectable-sized dacoity, they immediately began to reason it out. They said "Now why are there so many dacoities in the land? Obviously the lathi fathered the bomb and the bomb fathers the dacoities. Who have lathies? The samitis. Therefore it is proved. The Samitis are the dacoits." Our efficient police have always shown a wonderful ability. Generally when a dacoity is committed, the police are nowhere near. They have not altered that; that golden rule still obtains. They are not to be found when the dacoity takes place. They only came up when the dacoity is long over and say "Well, this is the work of the National volunteers." They look round to see what is the nearest Samiti and, if they find any which has been especially active in furthering Swadeshi, they say, "Here is the Samiti." And if there is anyone who was somewhat active in connection with the work of the Samiti, they say at once "Well, here is the man." And if he is a boy of any age from twelve upwards, so much the better. The man or boy is instantly arrested and put into hajat. After rotting there some days or weeks, the police can get no evidence and the man has to be released. That does not frighten the courageous police; they immediately arrest the next likely person belonging to the samiti. So they go on persevering until they lose all hope of finding or creating evidence. Sometimes they persist, and members of the Samitis, sometimes mere boys, have to rot in hajat until the case goes up to a court of justice and the judge looks at the case and after he has patiently heard it out, has to ask, "Well but where is the evidence."

Formerly, you may remember, those of you who have lived in the villages, that wherever there was any man in a village who was physically strong the police wrote down his name in the black book of budmashes. He was at once put down as an undesirable. That was the theory, that a man who is physically strong must be a hooligan. Physical development was thus stamped out of our villages and the physique of our villagers began to deteriorate until this movement of akharas and samitis came into existence to rescue the nation from absolute physical deterioration and decay. But this was an immortal idea in the mind of our police and it successfully effected transmigration. It took this form, that these Samitis encourage physical education, they encourage lathiplay, therefore they must be the nurseries of violence and dacoity and factories of bombs. Our rulers seem to have accepted this idea of the police. So perhaps this is the crime these Samitis have committed. Nothing has been proved of all this easy theorizing. It is yet to be known when and where the bomb has been associated with the work of the Samitis in Eastern Bengal. There was indeed a great dacoity in Eastern Bengal and the theory was started that it was done by one of the Samitis, but even our able detective police were unable to prove any association in that case. They did catch hold of some young men apparently on principle. There is a confidential rule,—it is confidential but the public have come to know of it,—that "somebody must be punished for the day's work." That was the circular of a Lieutenant-Governor of this province and the police no doubt thought it ought to be observed faithfully. So they caught hold of some likely men and the people so charged were about to be "punished for the day's work;" but fortunately for them a judge sat upon the High Court Bench who remembered that there was such a thing as law and another thing called evidence, things whose existence was in danger of being forgotten in this country. He applied the law, he insisted on having the evidence, and you all know the result.

These associations, then, which were the expression of our growing national life and the growing feeling of brotherhood among us, did such work as I have described, and these were the ways, guiltless of any offence in the eyes of the law, in which they did their work. Still they have been suppressed not because they were criminal, but because their existence was inconvenient. It has always been the case that when established institutions of government were unwilling to move with the times, they have looked with suspicion upon the right of association and the right of free speech, they have discouraged the right of a free press and the right of public meeting. By destroying these instruments they have thought to arrest the progress which they did not love. This policy has never permanently succeeded, yet it is faithfully repeated with that singular stupidity which seems natural to the human race. The sword of Damocles hangs over our press. It is nominally free, but we never know when even that simulacrum of freedom may not be taken from it. There is a law of sedition so beautifully vague and comprehensive that no one knows when he is committing sedition and when he is not. There is a law against the preaching of violence which enables a Magistrate whenever he chooses to imagine that your article advocates violence, to seize your machine. The Press is taken away and of course the case goes up to the High Court, but by that time the paper suffers so much that it becomes difficult or impossible for it to rear its head again. There is a notification by which as I pointed out in Beadon Square the other day, a meeting becomes peaceful or criminal not according to the objects or to the behaviour of the people assembled but according as the sun is up or the sun is down. There is a law of proclamation by which our right of association can be taken from us whenever they please by a stroke of the pen. The British people have certain traditions, they have certain ways of thinking and fixed ideas of which they can not entirely get rid. It is for that reason they have not yet passed a law entirely and expressly suppressing the freedom of the Press or the right of public meeting. But even that may come. What should we do under these circumstances? We see the sword of Damocles hanging lower and lower over our heads. Our association may be declared criminal and illegal at any moment. The executive can any moment it pleases confiscate our Press. We ourselves are liable to be arrested and harassed at any moment without evidence, "on suspicion", by an irresponsible and apparently unpunishable police. Under whatever difficulties and whatever restrictions may be put upon us, we must of course go on. But the restrictions may be greater in future. The sword is hanging lower and lower over our heads. Still we cannot stop in our work. The force within us cannot be balked, the call cannot be denied. Whatever penalty be inflicted on us for the crime of patriotism, whatever peril we may have to face in the fulfilment of our duty to our nation, we must go on, we must carry on the country's work.

After all what is an association? An association is not a thing which cannot exist unless we have a Chairman and a Vice-Chairman and a Secretary. An association is not a thing which cannot meet unless it has its fixed meeting place. Association is a thing which depends upon the feeling and the force within us. Association means unity, association means brotherhood association means binding together in one common work. Where there is life, where there is self-sacrifice where there is disinterested and unselfish toil, where there are these things within us, the work cannot stop. It cannot stop even if there be one man who is at all risks prepared to carry it on. It is only after all the question of working, it is not a question of the means for work. It is simply a question of working together in common in one way or in another. It is a matter of asking each other from time to time what work there is to be performed to day and what is the best way of performing it, what are the best means of helping our countrymen, what work we shall have to do tomorrow or the day after and having settled that to do it at the appointed time and in the appointed way. That is what I mean when I say that it is a question of working and not of means. It is not that these things cannot be done except by the forms which our European education has taught us to value. Whatever may be the difficulties we can go on with the work. The association that we shall have will be the association of brothers who are united heart to heart, of fellow-workers joined hand-in-hand in a common labour, the association of those who have a common motherland. It is the association of the whole country, to which every son of India and every son of Bengal ought by the duty of his birth to belong, an association which no force can break up, the association of an unity which grows closer day by day, of an impulse that comes from on high and has drawn us together in order that we might realise brotherhood, in order that the Indian nation may be united and united not merely in the European way, not merely by the common self-interest, but united by love for the common country, united by the ideal of brotherhood, united by the feeling that we are all sons of one common Mother who is also the manifestation of God in an united humanity. That is the association which has been coming into being, and has not been destroyed, since the movement came into existence. This is the mighty association, which unites the people of West Bengal with the people of East and North Bengal and defies partition, because it embraces every son of the land,—bhai bhai ek desh, or brother and brother massed inseparably together. This is the ideal that is abroad and is waking more and more consciously within us. It is not merely a common self-interest. It awakens God within us and says, "you are all one, you are all brothers. There is one place in which you all meet and that is your common Mother. That is not merely the soil. That is not merely a division of land but it is a living being. It is the Mother in whom you move and have your being. Realise God in the nation, realise God in your brother, realise God in a wide human association." This is the ideal by which humanity is moved all over the world, the ideal which is the dharma of the Kaliyuga, and it is the ideal of love and service which the young men of Bengal so thoroughly realised, love and service to your brothers, love and service to your Mother and this is the association we are forming, the great association of the people of Bengal and of the whole people of India. It increases and will grow for ever in spite of all the obstacles that rise in its way. When the spirit of Aeswini Kumar Dutt comes into every leader of the people and the nation becomes one great Swadeshi Bandhab Samiti, then it will be accomplished. This is for ever our national ideal and in its strength our nation will rise whatever law they make; our nation will rise and live by the force of the law of its own being. For the fiat of God has gone out to the Indian nation, "Unite, be free, be one, be great."

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION. BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has now been translated into almost all civilised languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus, Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in the world;—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties,—religious, social, political and moral; that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI PARVAM of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Puranas.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupefying mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His great teachings—the noblest and the grandest that were ever delivered,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such Parts. Each part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST, SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, Fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part per V. P. P. in One Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu house-hold should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis His great Religion stand.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstract Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the public in this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. REDUCED TO Rs. 1-8. Postage Extra.

MESSAGE OF THE EAST.

II.

What then is the message of the East? In its remote universal form it is still that message which the West has for nineteen centuries ignored: The kingdom of God is within you: Look within—Thou art the Buddha: Thou art that. As the message of the West has been one of diversity, analysis, and the separate self, so the message of the unity of all life, of synthesis, and the Universal self.

Art, philosophy, and morality are greater than empirical knowledge in as much as they transcend the physical order of the world in space, time and causality. "The investigation of the scientific," says a modern German writer* "are always in definite relation to the knowledge of their day. On the other hand, we can ascribe to the work of the great philosopher, as to that of the great artist, an imperishable, unchangeable presentation of the world, not 'disappearing with time.....Which of the merely scientific has felt in himself an unconditioned comprehension of all men and all things, or even the capacity to verify any single thing in his mind and by his mind? On the contrary, has not the whole history of the science of the last thousand years been directed against this?"

"It is the dharma of the artist to present to us this timeless vision of the universe, conceived not as an external phenomenon, but as a picture within himself.

Genius may be metaphorically described as a permeability of the diaphragm, or a thinning of the veil, which, as it were, separates the conscious from the super-conscious self." It is a remarkable characteristic of genius that ideas ('inspiration') seem to come altogether from without the consciousness. They originate in part in a region external to the mere intellect, being apprehended by the reason (buddhi) acting as a sixth sense organ (intuition). It is characteristic of the ideas thus apprehended, that they are apprehended as a whole. A great poem, or picture or musical composition is thus first more or less clearly 'seen' or 'heard' as a unity. By concentration, the details of this presentation may be developed, like the image on a photographic plate. The greatest genius is one to whom this process of development is most perfectly accomplished, or who sees or hears, and is able to retain, the presentation most completely.

Talent, per contra, is a matter of physical attitude, combined with that infinite capacity for taking pains which is so inaccurate a description of genius. This talent is necessary to the adequate expression of genius: it is essential to the process of giving visible or audible form to the ideas thus apprehended in a manner independent of succession in time. The talented genius is a prophet; the genius without talent is like a paccekā Buddha, of service only to himself for the time being. The man of talent without genius has, again his due place and work, which are only when, as is now too often the case, he rejects the help of traditions and attempts the work of creation, of which genius alone is capable.

Of course, this rigid distinction between genius and talent is artificial. No human being can be wholly devoid of either, and the various proportions in which the two exist very infinitely. Both may equally be strengthened by those who are prepared for the necessary practice, subjective and objective respectively.

It has never been supposed by oriental artists that the object of art is the reproduction of the external forms of nature. Such a conception, as we have seen, is only the natural product of a life divorced from beauty, for which a substitute has to be supplied. The exact imitation of nature, indeed, seen by all true artists and philosophers to be both impossible and unnecessary. "For why," says Deussen, "should the artist wish to imitate laboriously and adequately what nature offers everywhere in unattainable perfection," viz. individual, and, in so far, limited, manifestation of ideas?

In the realm of nature, we see the thousand fold repeated reflections of ideas in those individual manifestations. It is the business of the artist by yoga that is by self-identification with the soul of these reflections, to fully understand them and reveal their inner significance. "Guided by an insight into the nature of things which fathoms deeper than all abstract knowledge, he is able to understand the 'half uttered words of nature', to infer from what she forms that which she intends to form, to anticipate from the direction she takes the end she is herself unable to reach. "It is further possible by Imagination—the first and indispensable quality of genius, to apprehend ideas which, though subsisting in the race-consciousness, have not yet assumed, and may never assume, (save thus in art) a form visible to the physical eye. The forms of Gods or nature spirits, flowers or animals of 'other worlds' are illustrations of this possibility. So also with personifications of abstract qualities and natural forces. Lastly, and far from lest, we have the presentation of the imagined forms of legendary heroes, in which the race-idea finds its most complete expression. *Our individual belief in the 'real existence', past or present, of all or any of these is more or less irrelevant, for all of these alike possess an ideal being subsisting in the race-consciousness.

With this race-consciousness, the ideas may seem to die, more strictly to pass into a subconscious region: or passing beyond the bounds of race, they may attain a deathless life in the imagination of the whole world. It is not otherwise with the forms of God—for these are not his forms, but the forms through which we apprehend Him. He 'takes the forms imagined by His worshippers.' It is these forms which subsist in the race-consciousness and are imitated by the artist. Ideal art thus partakes of two natures, inextricably combined, just as in human personality there are both sub-consciousness, super-consciousness related respectively to past experience and potential experience. The first part of ideal art is the presentation of concepts, which are unities re-established by memory out of the multiplicity of individual experiences. Memory, racial and individual, eliminates the unessential and impermanent and so idealises. The second part of ideal art is the presentation of ideal forms, apprehended

*The 'historical painter' of to-day is usually little more than the illustration of an archaeological treatise. The true work of the artist, painter or poet, is not however to relate what happened, but to represent all that might have happened. An individual historical character concerning whom much is known is to much 'characterised' to be presented as a type. It is otherwise with the legendary heroes whose being has for ages awayed the hearts of men. These alone live in the world of the imagination, exerting an influence more powerful and more enduring than that of any individual by intuition, or imagination; that is, literally, the visualisation of Ideas. The artist, by Imagination approaches near to the mind of God (Ishvara), and apprehends the forms of a higher plane in his own consciousness, undarkened by adaption to external circumstances and by individual characteristics (imperfections). Ideal art is thus related, on the one hand, to empirical experience, and, on the other, to the transcendental reality that lies outside of space and time.—Dr. Coomaraswamy in the Modern Review.

নারক বলেন—এই ক্ষুদ্র পুস্তকে গ্রন্থকার বিশেষ স্নেহিত দেখাইয়াছেন। হিন্দুগৃহে নারীর কি ভাবে জীবন যাপন করা উচিত, এই প্রশ্ন নিচের তাহার একটি পরিষ্কৃত চিত্র দেখা হইয়াছে।

বহুমতী বলেন—“পূণ্য আদর্শ” লেখক মননভয়ের প্রসঙ্গে বলিয়াছেন “প্রেমের নিকট বিশ্ববিমোহন রূপ, * ত্রিলোকবিস্তারী মর্দন ও বসন্তাদি উদ্ভিদসমূহ কার্যকে আজি পরাজয় স্বীকার করিতে হইল। আজি কেন? উহার চির দিনই প্রেমের নিকট পরাজিত। আসক্তিপূর্ব নিকটই উহাদের যত শক্তি প্রকাশের প্রযোগ। আসক্তিলাপা রূপমোহে মুগ্ধ; চন্দ্র চন্দন ও বসন্তাদি উদ্ভিদসমূহ কারণে পাগল। হিন্দু আসক্তিলাপাকে তুচ্ছ করে। হিন্দু প্রেমের আদর্শ পার্শ্বতী-বরষের।”

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Englishman on Boycott.

The speech of Sj. Bhupendranath Bose at the boycott celebration and the Open Letter of Sj. Anurobindo Ghose have put the Englishman in a difficulty. It has been the habit of this paper to lay stress on any facts or suggestions real or imaginary which it could interpret as pointing to violence and so persistently damn the movement as one not only revolutionary in the magnitude of the changes at which it aims but violently revolutionary in its proposed methods. The speech and the open letter have cut this imaginary ground away from under its feet. As a matter of fact there is nothing new in the attitude of either the Moderate or the Nationalist leader. What they say now they have said always. The Moderate party have always been in favour of constitutional methods which, whatever be the precise meaning of that phrase in a country where no constitution exists, must certainly exclude illegality and violence. The Nationalists on their side have always, while repudiating the principle that men are under all circumstances bound to obey unjust or injurious laws imposed without national consent, advocated observance of the law in the circumstances of India both on grounds of policy and in the interests of sound national development. Passive resistance to arbitrary edicts and proclamations in order to assert civic rights, test illegal ukases or compel their recall is not breach of the law but a recognized weapon in the defence of civic liberty. Yet the Englishman chooses to save its face by imagining a change of front in the Boycott policy. There is no change. The Boycott has always been a movement within the law and such it remains. If there have been some individual excesses, that no more detracts from the legality of the movement than the excesses of individual strikers would affect the legality of a strike. The Englishman is full of anxiety as to the best way to meet the imagined change of front. With great sapience it suggests to the Government the free use of deportation, for which it has been for some time clamouring in vain, and threatens the boycotters with an anti-boycott. One does not quite see how this mighty movement could be engineered. If a boycott of Indians by Englishmen is suggested, we would remind our contemporary that in life in this country Indians might conceivably do without Englishmen but Englishmen cannot do without Indians. That is precisely the strength of our position. The misfortune is that we ourselves still fail to realise it.

Social Boycott.

It seems to be especially the Boycott President's able defence of social boycott as opposed to violent constraint that has alarmed the Englishman. Here also there is nothing new. The social boycott is a weapon absolutely necessary for the enforcement of the popular will in this matter, the power of using fiscal law for the same purpose being in the hands of authorities who have been publicly declared by Lord Curzon to be active parties in British exploitation of the resources of India. It means the coercion of a very small minority by a huge majority in the interests of the whole nation; it consists merely in a passive abstinence from all countenance to the offender,—sending him to Coventry, in the English phrase; it is effective and, if properly applied, instantaneously effective; it involves, as the Englishman has been obliged to see, no violence, no disregard of public order, no breach of the peace. The only weapon the Englishman can find against it is deportation, and after all you cannot deport a whole town, village or community. The Nationalist Party have always struggled for and often obtained the recognition of the social boycott at various District Conferences and it has been freely and effectively applied in all parts, though mostly in East Bengal. It is gratifying to find the most moderate of Bengal Moderate leaders supporting and justifying it in a carefully prepared and responsible utterance on an occasion of the utmost public importance.

National or Anti-national.

We have long noticed with the deepest disapprobation and indignation the equivocal conduct of the National Council authorities with regard to matters of great national importance, but we have held our peace from unwillingness to hurt an institution established with such high hopes and apparently destined to play an important part in the development of the nation. We can hold our peace no longer. The action of the authorities in forbidding their students to attend a national festival commemorating the inception of the movement by which the College and Council were created,—a prohibition extended by them to the mofussil schools,—is only the crowning act of a policy by which they are betraying the trust reposed in them by the nation, contradicting the very object of the institution and utterly ruining a great and salutary movement. They imagine that by being more servile than the most servile of the ordinary institutions and flaunting their high academical purpose they will save themselves from official repression and yet keep the support of the people. They are wrong. Already there is such deep dissatisfaction with the Council that the mofussil schools are dying of inanition and people are turning away from the new education as differing in no essential from the old. If the authorities persist in their evil course, the public mind will write Anti-national instead of National over their sign-board in Bow Bazaar and their schools, be left empty of students. We shall return to this subject in a future issue.

THE BOYCOTT CELEBRATION.

A national festival is the symbol of the national vitality. All outward action depends eventually on the accepted ideas and imaginations of the doer. As these are, so is his aspiration; and although it is not true that as is his aspiration, so is his action, yet it is true that as is his aspiration, so will his action more and more tend to be. If it is the idea that finally expresses itself in all material forms, actions, institutions and consummations, it is the imagination that draws the idea out, suggests the shape and gives the creative impulse. Hence the importance of celebrations like the Seventh of August, especially in the first movements of a great national resurgence. A time may come when the living meaning may pass out of a solemnity or anniversary and leave it a dead form which only the persistence of habit preserves, but that cannot happen until the underlying idea is realised and the imaginative impulse towards creation has victoriously justified itself and exhausted its sources of satisfaction. The ideas which the boycott celebration holds as its roots and the imaginations to which it appeals are not yet even partially satisfied and, until they have confirmed themselves in victorious action and are perpetuated in lasting forms and institutions, it is of the first importance that this great festival should be celebrated in some form or other and, as far as possible, in the form it originally took. There is a meaning in the imaginative conservatism which refuses to part with the cherished pomps and even the little details of show and brightness which have always been associated with this day, the procession, the places, the meeting, the flags, music, songs, the vow, the resolution. Any laxness in these minutiae would show a fainting of the imagination which clings to the festival and its underlying ideas and a carelessness in the heart about those emotions without which the idea by itself is always inoperative. This appeal to the imagination and nourishing of the emotions is especially necessary when the outward circumstances are widely different from the cherished hopes and imaginations and the speedy advent of the longed-for future seems to the reason distant or improbable. That is why importance is attached in all countries to ceremonies and festivals. There are many of us who are inclined to speak with contempt of speeches and shows, and there was a time when we too in our impatience of the mere babbler were inclined to echo the cry for silent work. A juster knowledge of human psychology has led us to modify our view on that head. Man is not by nature a silent animal nor in the mass is he capable of work without frequent interchange of speech. Talk is necessary to him, emotion is necessary to him, imagination is necessary to him; without these he cannot be induced to action. This constitutes the supreme importance of the right of free speech and free meeting; this also constitutes the justification of symbolical holidays and festivals. Speech and writing are necessary to the acceptance and spread of the idea without which there can be no incentive to action. Ceremonies help the imagination and encourage it to see in the concrete that which cannot be immediately realised. It was out of the gurge and welter of an infinite oratory, thousand-throated journalism, endless ceremonies, processions, national festivals that the appallingly strenuous action of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic age in France arose to reconstitute society and transform Europe. Let us not therefore despise these mighty instruments. God has created them and the natural human love for them for very great and abiding purposes. Even in these few years the Ganpati and Sivaji festivals, instituted by the far-seeing human sympathy and democratic instinct of Mr. Tilak, have done much to reawaken and solidify the national feeling of Maharashtra, and we can all feel what a stimulus to the growth and permanence of the movement we have found in the celebrations of the 7th August and the 16th October. They are to us what sacred days are to the ordinary religions. The individual religious man can do without them, collective religion cannot. These are the sacred days in the religion of Nationalism, the worship of God the Mother.

The 16th October is the idea of unity, the worship of the Mother one and indivisible. The 7th of August is the idea of separateness, the worship of the Mother free, strong and glorious. Both these ideas are as yet ideas merely, realized in our faith and aspiration by the shaping imagination, not yet materialized in the world of concrete fact. This, according to our Vedantic ideas, is how the world and things whether in general or particular come into being. They exist first in seed form in the silent and unexpressed idea, in a world of deep sleep where there is as yet no action of thought or deed, only the inert, inoperative idea. Shiva the white and pure, the ascetic, the still, contemplative Yogin holds them in himself as Prajna, the Wise One, God ideal. But Shiva is tamasic and rajas is necessary to induce motion before things can exist. The thing has next to sprout out of the seed and take a volatile and unfixed shape in the psychic world where it waits for a material birth. Here Brahma, the flaming, shapeless and many-shaped, holds them in his brilliant vibrating medium of active imagination and thought and by his daughter Vach, the Goddess speech eldestborn of the world, puts them into shape and body as Hiranyagarbha, God imaginative and therefore creative. Last they take permanent shape and abide in some material body, form, organism. Vishnu there holds them in his fixed and visible cosmos as Virat, God practical, until the divine imagination wearies of them and Shiva as destroyer draws them back again, their outward form disintegrated and their supporting imaginations dead, into the seed-state from which they emerged. For a long time the idea of unity, the idea of a strong national self-expression were merely sleeping and inoperative ideas held as sounding words rather than possibilities. Still the repetition of the words like the repetition even mechanical of a powerful mantra, began to awaken the divine force latent in the idea and, however feebly, it began to stir. But it was not till the 16th of October and the 7th of August that these ideas seized on the faith and imagination of the people and took shape, volatile and unfixed but still shape, as a living aspiration. The day of material realization is yet distant. Moving to unity we are still divided by external and internal agencies. Moving towards strength and freedom we are still subject to external force and internal weakness. But this we have gained that the purpose and imagination of unity and strength is rooted in the hearts and minds of a great and the most vigorous portion of the young generation, inheritors of the future, beyond the power of force or sophistry to remove. Having secured so much we can go on in the confidence that, whatever now happens to the pioneers, Hiranyagarbha has taken the new ideas into his protection and when that has once happened Virat must inevitably fulfil them.

It is a shortsighted and superficial outlook which sees in the 16th October only the day of mourning for the partition of Bengal or in the 7th August only a commemoration of the Boycott. The Boycott is a symbol, the mourning a symbol. When the weapon of Boycott has done its work, we shall lay it aside, but the 7th August we shall not lay aside, for it is our sacred Day of Awakening. When the Partition is rescinded, we shall cease to go into annual mourning, but the 16th October will not fall into oblivion or desuetude, for it is our sacred Day of the Worship of the Indivisible Mother. These are the imaginations, these the mighty and creative thoughts and aspirations which we seek to foster by these celebrations. Therefore we regard the holding of the Boycott Day as a national duty. Let those who scoff at it and talk of the necessity of silent sadhana, for we have heard of such, be warned how they desecrate sacred words by using them as a convenient cant and try, out of selfish and infidel fears, to thwart in the minds of the young the work which by these celebrations God has been doing.

KALIDASA'S SEASONS.

ITS POETIC VALUE.

Nevertheless the Seasons is not only an interesting document in the evolution of a poetic genius of the first rank, but in itself a work of extraordinary force and immense promise. Many of the most characteristic Kalidasian gifts and tendencies are here, some of them in crude and unformed vigour but characteristic and unmistakeable, giving the poem a striking resemblance of spirit and to some extent of form to the House of Raghou with a far-off prophecy of the mature manner of Kalidasa in the four great masterpieces. There is his power of felicitous and vivid simile, there is the individual turn of his conceits and the single-minded force with which he drives them home, there is his mastering accuracy and lifelikeness in description conspicuous especially in the choice and building of the circumstantial epithets. That characteristic of the poet, not the most fundamental and important, which most struck the ancient critics, upamasa Kalidasa for similes, is everywhere present even in such early and immature work, and already they have the sharp clear Kalidasian ring, true coin of his mint though not yet possessed of the later high values. The deep blue midsummer sky is a rich purple mass of ground collyrium; girls with their smiling faces and loveliest eyes are "evenings beautifully jewelled with the moon"; the fires burning in the forest look far off like clear drops of vermilion; the new blades of grass are pieces of split emerald; rivers embracing and tearing down the trees on their banks are evil women distracted with passion slaying their lovers. In all these instances we have the Kalidasian simile, a little superficial as yet and self-conscious, but for all that Kalidasian. When again he speaks of the moon towards dawn growing pale with shame at the lovelier brightness of a woman's face, of the rains coming like the pomp of some great king all blazing with lights, huge clouds moving along like elephants, the lightning like a streaming banner and the thunder like a peal of drums, of the clouds like archers shooting their rains at the lover from the rainbow stringed with lightning, one recognises, in spite of the occasional extravagance of phrase and violent fancifulness, the Kalidasian form of conceit, not only in the substance which can be borrowed, but in the wording and most of all in the economy of phrase expressing a lavish and ingenious fancy. Still more is this apparent in the sensuous and elaborate comparison of things in Nature to women in ornamental attire,—rivers, autumn, the night, the pale priyungou creeper.

Most decisive of all are the strokes of vivid description that give the poem its main greatness and fulfil its purpose. The seasons live before our eyes as we read. Summer is here with its sweltering heats, the sunbeams burning like fires of sacrifice and the earth swept with whirling gyres of dust driven by intolerable gusts. Yonder lies the lion forgetting his impulse and his mighty leap; his tongue lolls and wearily from time to time he shakes his mane ; the snake with lowered head panting and dragging his coils labours over the blazing dust of the road : the wild boars are digging in the dried mud with their long snouts as if they would burrow their way into the cool earth : the bisons wander everywhere dumbly desiring water. The forests are grim and parched, brown and sere ; and before long they are in the clutch of fire... But the rains come, and what may be yonder writhing line we see on the slopes ? It is the young water of the rains, a new-born rivulet, grey and full of insects and dust and weeds, coiling like a snake down the hillside. We watch the beauty of the mountains streaked everywhere with waterfalls, their high rocks kissed by the stooping clouds and their sides a gorgeous chaos of peacocks : on the horizon the great clouds blue as lotus-petals climb hugely into the sky and move across it in slow procession before a sluggish breeze. Or look at yonder coidara tree, its branches troubled softly with wind, swarming with honey-drunken bees and its leaves tender with little opening buds. The moon at night gazes down at us like an unveiled face in the skies, the racing stream dashes its ripples in the wild-duck's face, the wind comes trembling through the burdened rice-stalks, dancing with the crowding courbouses, making one flowery ripple of the lotus-wooded lake. Here there can be no longer any hesitation. These descriptions which remain perpetually with the eye, visible and concrete as an actual painting, belong, in the force with which they are visualised and the magnificent architecture of phrase with which they are presented, to Kalidasa alone among Sanscrit poets. Other poets, his successors or imitators, such as Bana or even Bhavabhuti, overload their description with words and details ; they have often lavish colouring but never an equal power of form, their figures do not appear to stand out of the canvas and live.

And though we do not find here quite the marvellous harmonies of verse and diction we find in the Raghov, yet we do come across plenty of preparation for them. Here for instance is a verse whose rapidity and lightness restrained by a certain half-hidden gravity is distinctly Kalidasa's.

स्तुति पदमिनादेः दुःस्वप्नस्य लीषु ।

प्रसरति दृष्टमधोः सन्धुहविः जवेन

ज्वपयति मृगवर्गं प्रामलस्यो द्वाग्निः ॥

"Seizing the woodland edges the forest fire increases with the wind and burns in the glens of the mountains ; it crackles with shrill shoutings in the bamboo reaches ; it spreads wide in the grasses gathering hugeness in a moment and harrasses the beasts of the wilderness."

And again for honeyed sweetness and buoyancy what can be more Kalidasian than this ?

पुंस्त्र्योकि लघुत्तरसावेन

मत्तः प्रियां चुम्बति रागहृदः ।

गुञ्जन्दिरेजोयममुजस्यः

प्रियं प्रियायाः प्रकरोति चादु ॥

"The male cuckoo, drunken with the wine of the mango juice, kisses his beloved, glad of the sweet attraction, and yonder bee in the lotus-blossom murmuring hums flattery's sweetness to his sweet."

There are other stanzas which anticipate something of the ripest Kalidasian movements by their gravity, suavity and strength.

आकम्पयन् कुसुमिताः सहकारशाखाः

विस्तारयन् परभृताम् वचांसि दिशु ।

वागुर्विभावि हृदयानि हरनराणां

नीहारपातविगमात् सुभगो वसन्ते ॥

"Setting the flowering branches of the mango-tree quivering, [spread:] ing abroad the cry of the cuckoo to the regions the wind fares forth like a lover ravishing the hearts of mortals, by the passing of the dewfalls gracious in the springtide."

If we take Kalidasa anywhere in his lighter metres we shall at once perceive their essential kinship with the verse of the Seasons.

इदमसुलभवलुप्रार्थनादुर्निवारं

प्रथमपि मनो मे पञ्चवानः चिन्तेति ।

किमुतमलयवातोन्मीलित पाण्डुरवर्णं

उपवनसहकारैर्दक्षितेष्वाकरेषु ॥

It is the same suave and skilful management, the same exquisite and unobtrusive weaving of labial, dental and liquid assonances with a recurring sibilant note, the same soft and perfect footing of the syllables. Only the language is richer and more developed. We do not find this peculiar kind of perfection in any other master of classical verse. Bhavabhuti's manner is bold, strenuous, external ; Jayadeva's music is based palpably upon assonance and alliteration which he uses with extraordinary brilliance and builds into the most enchanting melodies, but without delicacy, restraint or disguise. If there were any real cause for doubt of the authorship, the verse would clearly vindicate the Seasons for Kalidasa.

Such is this remarkable poem which some, led away by its undoubted splendours, have put in the first rank of Kalidasa's work. Its artistic defects and its comparative crudity forbid us to follow them. It is uncertain in plan, ill-fused, sometimes raw in its imagery, unequal in its execution. But for all that it must have come upon its contemporaries like the dawning of a new sun in the skies. Its splendid diction and versification, its vigour, fire and force, its sweetness of spirit and its general promise and to some extent actual presentation of a first-rate poetical genius must have made it a literary event of the first importance. Especially is it significant in its daring gift of sensuousness. The prophet of a hedonistic civilisation here seizes with no uncertain hand on the materials of his work. A vivid and virile interpretation of sense-life in Nature, a similar interpretation of all elements of human life capable of greatness or beauty, seen under the light of the senses and expressed in the terms of an aesthetic appreciation,—this is the spirit of Kalidasa's first work as it is of his last. At present he is concerned only with the outward body of Nature, the physical aspects of things, the vital pleasures and emotions, the joy and beauty of the human body ; but it is the first necessary step on the long road of sensuous and poetic experience and expression he has to travel before he reaches his goal in his crowning work, the Birth of the wargod, where the Supreme Himself and the mystery of spiritual fulfilment are approached through the portal of the senses.

THE KENA UPANISHAD.

SECOND PART. FIRST CHAPTER.

1. Yamā said. "The Self-born hath set the doors of the body to face outward, therefore the soul of a man gazeth outward and not at the Self within ; hardly a wise man here and there desiring immortality tufneth his eyes inward and seeth the Self within him."

2. The most childishly follow after desire and pleasure and walk into the snare of Death who gapeth wide for them. But calm souls having learned of immortality seek not for permanence in the things of this world that pass and are not.

3. By the Self one knoweth taste and form and smell, by the Self one knoweth sound and touch and the joy of man with woman; what is there left in this world of which the Self not knoweth? This is the thing thou seekest.

4. The calm soul having comprehended the great Lord, the omnipresent Self by whom one beholdeth both to the end of dream and to the end of waking, ceaseth from grieving.

He that hath known from very close this Eater of sweetness, the Jiva, the Self within that is lord of what is and what shall be, shrinketh not hereafter from aught nor abhorreth any. This is the thing thou seekest.

6. He is the seer that seeth Him who came into being before austerity and was before the water; deep in the heart of the creature he seeth Him, for there He standeth by the mingling of the elements. This is the thing thou seekest.

7. This is Aditi, the mother of the Gods, who was born through the Prana and by the mingling of the elements had her being; deep in the heart of things she has entered, there she is seated. This is the thing thou seekest.

8. As a woman carrieth with care the unborn child in her womb, so is the Master of knowledge lodged in the tinders, and day by day should men worship him who live their waking life and stand before him with sacrifice; for he is that Agni. This is the thing thou seekest.

9. He from whom the sun riseth and to whom the sun returneth, and in Him are all the Gods established, —none passeth beyond Him. This is the thing thou seekest.

10. What is in his world is also in the other, and what is in the other, that again is in this; who thinketh he sees difference here, from death to death he goeth.

11. Through the mind must we understand that there is nothing in this world that is really various, who thinketh he sees difference here, from death to death he goeth.

12. The Purusha who is seated in the midst of ourself is no larger than the finger of a man. He is the lord of what was and what shall be; Him having seen one shrinketh not from aught nor abhorreth any. This is the thing thou seekest.

13. The Purusha that is within is no larger than the finger of a man; He is like a blazing fire that is without smoke. He is lord of His past and His future. He alone is today and He alone shall be tomorrow. This is the thing thou seekest.

14. As water that raineth in the rough and difficult places, runneth to many sides on the mountain-tops, so he that seeth separate law and action of the one Spirit, followeth in the track of what he seeth.

15. But as pure water that is poured into pure water, even as it was such it remaineth, so it is with the soul of the thinker who knoweth God, a seed of Gotam."

CHAPTER I.

It was a summer day of the Bengali year 1176. The glare and heat of the sun lay very heavy on the village of Padchinha. The village was crowded with houses, yet there was not a man to be seen. Line upon line of shops in the bazaar, row upon row of booths in the mart, hundreds of earthen houses interspersed with stone mansions high and low in every quarter. But to-day all was silent. In the bazaar the shops are closed, and where the shopkeeper has fled no man can tell. It is market day to-day, but in the mart there is no buying and selling. It is the beggars' day but the beggars are not out. The weaver has shut up his loom and lies weeping in his house; the trader has forgotten his traffic and weeps with his infant in his lap; the givers have left giving and the teachers closed their schools; the very infant, it would seem, has no longer heart to cry aloud. No wayfarers are to be seen in the highways, no bathers in the lake, no human forms at door and threshold, no birds in the trees, no cattle in the pastures, only in the burning-ground dog and jackal crowd. In that crowded desolation of houses one huge building whose great fluted pillars could be seen from afar, rose glorious as the peak of a hill. And yet where was the glory? the doors were shut, the house empty of the concourse of men, hushed and voiceless, difficult even to the entry of the wind. In a room within this dwelling where even noon was a darkness, in that darkness, like a pair of lilies flowering in the midnight, a wedded couple sat in thought. Straight in front of them stood Famine.

The harvest of the year 1174 had been poor, consequently in the year 1175 rice was a little dear, the people suffered, but the Government exacted its revenues to the last fraction of a farthing. As a result of this careful reckoning the poor began to eat only once a day. The rains in 1175 were copious and people thought Heaven had taken pity on the land. Joyously once more the herdsman sang his ditty in the fields, the tiller's wife again began to tease her husband for a silver bracelet. Suddenly in the month of Aswin Heaven turned away its face. In Aswin and Kartik not a drop of rain fell; the grain in the fields withered and turned to straw as it stood. Wherever a ear or two flourished, the officials bought it for the troops. The people no longer had anything to eat. First they stinted themselves of one meal in the day, then even from their single meal they rose with half-filled stomachs, next the two meal-times became two fasts. The little harvest reaped in Chaitra was not enough to fill the hungry mouths. But Mahomed Reza Khan, who was in charge of the revenues, thought fit to show himself off as a loyal servant and immediately enhanced the taxes by ten per cent. Throughout Bengal arose a clamour of great weeping.

First, people began to live by begging, but afterwards who could give alms? They began to fast. Next they fell into the clutch of disease. The cow was sold, plough and yoke were sold, the seed-rice was eaten, hearth and home were sold, land and goods were sold. Next they began to sell their girls. After that they began to sell their boys. After that they began to sell their wives. Next girl, boy or wife,—who would buy? Purchasers there were none, only sellers. For want of food men began to eat the leaves of trees, they began to eat grass, they began to eat weeds. The lower castes and the forest men began devouring dogs, mice and cats. Many fled, but those who fled only reached some foreign land to dip of starvation. Those who remained ate uneatables or subsisted without food till disease took hold of them and they died.

Disease had its day,—fever, cholera, consumption, smallpox. The virulence of smallpox was especially great. In every house men began to perish of the disease. There was none to give water to his fellow, none who would touch him, none to treat the sick. Men would not turn to care for each other's sufferings, nor was there any to take up the corpse from where it lay. Beautiful bodies lay rotting in wealthy mansions. For where once the smallpox made its entry, the dwellers fled from the house and abandoned the sick man in their fear.

Mohendra Singha was a man of great wealth in the village of Padshinha, but to-day rich and poor were on one level. In this time of crowding afflictions his relatives, friends, servants, maidservants had all been seized by disease and gone from him. Some had died, some had fled. In that once peopled household there was only himself, his wife and one infant girl. This was the couple of whom I spoke. To be continued.

SUPRABHAT.

A REVIEW.

The paper Suprabhat, a Bengali monthly edited by Kumari Kumudini Mitra, daughter of S. J. Krishna Kumar Mitra, enters this month on its third year. The first issue of the new year is before us. We notice a great advance in the interest and variety of the articles, the calibre of the writers and the quality of the writing. From the literary point of view the chief ornament of the number is the brief poem Dukkhahisar, by S. J. Rabindranath Tagore. It is one of those poems in which the peculiar inimitable quality of our greatest lyric poet comes out with supreme force, beauty and sweetness. Rabindra Babu has a legion of imitators and many have been very successful in catching up his less valuable mannerisms of style and verse, as is the manner of imitators all the world over. But the poignant sweetness, passion and spiritual depth and mystery of a poem like this, the haunting cadences subtle with a subtlety which is not of technique but of the soul, and the honeyladen felicity of the expression, these are the essential Rabindranath and cannot be imitated, because they are things of the spirit and one must have the same sweetness and depth of soul before one can hope to catch any of these desirable qualities. We emphasize this inimitableness because the legion of imitators we mention are doing harm to the progress of our poetry as well as to the reputation of their model and we would suggest to them to study this poem and realise the folly of their persistent attempt. One of the most remarkable peculiarities of Rabindra Babu's genius is the happiness and originality with which he has absorbed the whole spirit of Vaishnav poetry and turned it into something essentially the same and yet new and modern. He has given the old sweet spirit of emotional and passionate religion an expression of more delicate and complex richness voiceful of subtler and more penetratingly spiritual shades of feeling than the deep-hearted but simple early age of Bengal could know. The old Vaishnav bhava—there is no English word for it,—was easily seizable, broad and strong. The bhava of these poems is not translatable in any other language than that the poet has used,—a striking proof is the unsatisfactory attempt of the poet himself, recorded in another article in this issue, to explain in prose his own poem, Sonar Tari. But while the intellect tries in vain to find other intellectual symbols for the poet's meaning, the poetry seizes on the heart and convinces the imagination. These poems are of the essence of poetry and refuse to be rendered in any prose equivalent. Poetry is created not from the intellect or the outer imagination but comes from a deeper source within to which men have no means of access except when the divine part within seizes on the brain and makes it a passive instrument for utterance the full meaning of which the brain is unable at the moment to grasp. This is the divine mania and enthusiasm which the subtle spiritual discernment of Plato discovered to be the real meaning of what we call inspiration. And of this unattainable force the best lyrics of Rabindranath are full to overflowing.

The article Shantiniketan Rabindranath by S. J. Jitendranath Banerji is another feature of great interest. The writer has a good descriptive gift and the passages which describe the Shantiniketan are admirable; but the chief interest naturally centres in the conversation with the poet which is recorded with great fulness. The private talk of a rich and gifted nature with a power of conversational expression is always suggestive and we await with interest the future issue of this article. We hope Jitendra Babu will give us a fuller view of the remarkable educational experiment which this original mind is developing in the quiet shades of Bolpur. The brief hints given of the moral training and the method of education followed point to a system far in advance of the National Council of Education which is still tyrannised over by a tradition and method not only European but unprogressively European. A brief instalment of S. J. Aurobindo Ghose's Karakahini is also given which describes the identification parades of the Bomb Case, gives some glimpses of the approver Noren Gossain and deals with the personal character of some of the jail officials. Nanak Charit by S. J. Krishna Kumar Mitra, the first instalment of which is given in this issue, commands interest both by its subject and the name of its writer. The two chapters given are full of interesting details of Nanak's birth and childhood and promise an attractive biography of one of the greatest names in religious history. An article of minor importance is the continuation of S. J. Jadunath Chakrabarti's Ekanmabarti Paribar o Strisiksha, which is of considerable merit. The author has seized on two of the great advantages of the joint family system, its ideal of a wider brotherhood and unity and its ample training in morale and capacity. Duinit Bal and the poem Bodhin seem to us to be failures, but there is no other feature of this number which is without merit or interest.

We have left to the last Dr. P. C. Ray's long article on "the Bengali Brain and its Misuse". It is a long indictment of past and present Bengal, covering sixteen pages of the magazine. Dr. P. C. Ray is a name which is already a pride to the nation to which he belongs and his deep scientific knowledge, original research and creativeness are one of the most conspicuous instances of that strong, acute and capable Bengali intellect which he admits to be inferior to none. Any article from his pen must be of great interest and cannot be without value. But it is one of the unfortunate results of the denationalising influence of our past education that a mind like Dr Ray's should be without intellectual sympathy for the old national culture whose inherited tendencies his own character, life and achievements illustrate in so distinguished a manner. If it had not been for the past which Dr P. C Ray condemns, such noble types as the last fifty years of Bengal teems with, would not have been possible. As to the necessity of far-reaching changes in the future we do not greatly differ with the writer. The immediate past has been a period of contraction and the reservation of strength, the future will be a period of expansion and the liberation and expenditure of strength. The structure of the new age must necessarily differ from that of the old. But the spirit of the article is narrow and intolerant. It is couched in that general spirit of self-depreciation and indiscriminate fault-finding which was a characteristic of our people when national hope and energy were at their nadir. There are all the stock denunciations with which we were familiar before the recent resurgence. Such writings void of the note of hope, encouragement and energy, will not help a nation to rise but rather depress it and push it back into the past. Moreover, Dr. Ray makes the same mistake which European writers made when they condemned the Middle Ages wholesale because they were a period of contraction and not of expansion. That mistake has now been recognised in Europe and justice has been done to that which was praiseworthy as well as to that which was bad in the "Dark Ages". We in India are recovering from a similar error and if there are those who go to the opposite extreme and see nothing good outside the mediaeval Hindu culture and forms, the same thing happened in Europe and for the same reason, as a reaction from that very intolerance and sweeping denunciation which are the spirit of Dr Ray's article. It cannot last any more than it lasted in Europe. Some of the strictures we hold to be too much at secondhand; especially in his criticisms of religion the writer seems to us to be wandering outside the province in which he can speak with authority. After all one must enter into the spirit of an age and civilisation before one can profitably criticise it, otherwise we miss the meaning of history and falsify its values. Nevertheless the article is ably written and should be studied as a complete expression of the Europeanised standpoint in looking at Indian problems. As to the present, Dr Ray lays too much stress on the survivals of the end of the nineteenth century when the national consciousness touched bottom and ignores the youthful strength and energy which is preparing the twentieth.

ANOTHER ASSAULT BY AN EUROPEAN.

BOMBAY, August 7.

Lieutenant Dockwell of the 116th Maharatta, against whom the charge of assault was withdrawn on Thursday before last by a Parsee, was on the 6th charged before Mr. Duttar, Second Magistrate, with assaulting another Parsee youth at Chowpatty. The complainant said that he was taking a walk on the footpath when the accused, who was taking a running exercise with his soldiers on the road, rushed up the footpath, caught the complainant by the neck and threw him down which caused a bruise on his left arm. The complainant was corroborated by a puresi. The accused said that as he passed running by the complainant, the latter laughed and made some remarks in Gujarati. He went back to the complainant to enquire what remarks he made when the complainant stepped backwards and fell. He said that he was justified in catching the complainant to find out what reason he had to laugh and make a fool of him before his soldiers. The accused called two of his soldiers as witnesses, one of whom said that while running the Shahib's elbow struck the Parsee. Another said that the Shahib's shoulders struck the Parsee who fell. The Magistrate held the evidence for the prosecution trust-worthy. His Worship thought that the accused asked the complainant why the latter laughed at him. This perhaps provoked the accused but the accused was not justified to take the law in his own hands. His Worship warned and discharged the accused but ordered him to pay the complainant rupee one and annas four for expense.

A correspondent says the latest advices from Kabul state that the five Indians alleged to have been implicated in the recent conspiracy have at last been brought to trial. They have been twice remanded to custody, but feel confident of a speedy release.

BUDDHA'S RELICS.—The recent find of Buddha's relics near Peshawar has been received at Simla and inspected by His Excellency the Viceroy. The question of distribution will now come up for consideration, and it is practically settled that the ashes and four charred bones will be distributed among the great Buddhist communities of Ceylon, Burma, China and Japan. It may be that deputations from these countries will come to take relics, or special envoys will be sent out with gifts.

SIMLA FINE ARTS EXHIBITION.—The awards of Simla Fine Arts Exhibition were announced on the evening of the 9th instant. The Indian artists figure badly. Messrs. Pestonji Bomanji and Handalkar have been given three prizes mainly reserved for Indian artists and not a picture of any intrinsic value has been received from Bengal and the Upper Provinces. The Viceroy's prize has not been awarded, and Major Molyneux who painted the famous picture "Senemarg in Spring" carries off Lord Kitchener's prize with his painting "A Himalayan Solitude." This is the best picture in the show. Mrs. Ambler gets Sir Louis Dane's prize for "A portrait of Mrs. C. T. Ambler." The exhibition will be formally opened on Wednesday.

STRANGE INCIDENT.—

The 'Deshsevak' office was searched at Nagpur in connection with the prosecution for sedition of Mr. Achut Balwant Kolhatkar, in 1908. It is now eight months since the Sessions Judge delivered judgment in the case. And the register of subscribers of the paper, which was seized by the police during the search, has not yet been returned. The register was not submitted in the case as an Exhibit, and both the District and Sessions Judges were applied to for the register, and yet the register is still not returned though other papers of less importance were returned long ago. Some subscribers of the paper are however writing to the effect that they are being pressed by the police to stop subscribing to the paper.

The Prabodh press in which the 'Deshsevak' (Nagpur) newspaper is printed and the premises of Mr. Sambhuras Gadgil B. A. LL. B. and Mr. Gopa Anant Ogale, ex-editors of that paper, was searched by the police for nearly three hours. Nothing incriminating was found. A warrant of arrest was shown to Mr. Gadgil who surrendered to the police. Mr. Gadgil was taken to the District Court in a tonga and presented before the District Magistrate. The charge is under Section 124 A for criticism of the Birthday Honours list. Bail was granted and Mr. Gadgil was released.

SURESH CHANDRA GHOSH

(From Suray)

When death overtook him, in the very prime of life, there was desolation in many a poor home in his district. It not only left his own children in absolute poverty, but destroyed the source of ready relief to many helpless families among his relations and neighbours. His quick intellectual perceptions, his large sympathies, his selflessness, characterised by an almost absolute lack of what the man of the world, always working with an eye to the main chance, calls prudence, as a matter of personal calculation—these are Aravinda's inheritance in his father's line.

As a boy, Aravinda received his early education in a public school in England. The old headmaster of this school is reported to have said, when Aravinda's name came prominently before the British public in connection with the State trial of which he was made the principal accused, this time last year—that of all the boys who passed through his hands during the last twenty-five or thirty years, Aravinda was by far and above the most richly endowed in intellectual capacity. From this school he went to Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a student of European classics, and passed the Indian Civil Service examination with great credit. Failing, however, to stand the required test in horsemanship he was not allowed to enter the Covenanted Services of the Indian Government. But returning to India he found employment in the Native State of Baroda, where his endowments and scholarship soon attracted the notice of the authorities, leading to his appointment to the post of Vice-Principal of the State College. Had Aravinda cared for earthly honours or wealth, he had a very splendid opening for both in Baroda. He was held in great respect by the Maharaja. He was loved by the educated classes in the State. He was exceedingly popular with the general public. All these opened very large possibilities of preferment before him in the service of this premier Native State in India.

But there was a new awakening in the country. A new school of thought had arisen, demanding a thorough reconsideration of the old and popular political, economic, and educational ideas and ideals of the people. It abjured the old mendicant methods of prayer, protest and petition. It proclaimed a new gospel of self-help and self-reliance. It called out to the spirit of India to come to its own, to stand upon its own inner strength, and put forth its own native energy for the realisation of its true national life. It called aloud for leaders and workers—for the poet, the prophet, the philosopher, the statesman, the orator and the doer, to help the people to their feet, to lead them to the light, to show them the way to the future.

It demanded of any public man in modern India. It wanted men who would not only, as Aravinda, give to their country their leisure moments and their idle pennies, but who would consecrate all their working hours and their hard earnings to the service of the Motherland. The call went home to the heart of Aravinda. His own native Province called for him. It laid on him the yoke of poverty. It offered him the yoke of the saviours of their people and the uplifters of humanity—the yoke of calumny, persecution, imprisonment and exile. Aravinda obeyed the Mother's call, accepted her stern conditions, and cheerfully took up her chastening yoke. He gave up his place in Baroda, worth £500 a year, to take up the duties of Principal in the College started at Calcutta under the new National Council of Education on a bare subsistence allowance of £10 a month.

This movement of National Education owed its origin to the latest education-policy of the Indian Government, who sought to turn the institutions of public instruction in the country to distinctly political ends. The old education had given birth to wide-spread disaffection. It had called into being "the discontented B. A.'s." The new educational policy initiated by Lord Curzon was directed towards curing this evil. Its aim was to manufacture loyal citizens—men who would be eternally content to remain loyal to the autocratic government in their country, without any desire for free citizenship. The movement of National Education was the people's reply to this official policy. It took definite shape and form as a result of the persecution of schoolboys, by the Executive in Bengal, for their participation in the new political movements in the country. But it had a more fundamental need. The officially-controlled education had been condemned by both friends and foes alike. It was shallow and rootless. It imparted the shadow, but not the substance, of modern culture to the youths of the nation. It was artificial, because foreign in both its spirit and form. It led to a fearful waste of youthful time and energy by imposing the necessity of learning a foreign language, to receive instructions through its medium in all the higher branches of study. It was controlled by an alien Bureaucracy, in the interests, mainly, of their own political position, and only secondarily in those of the real intellectual life of the pupils. It was exclusively literary, and detrimental to the industrial and economic life of the country. The movement of National Education was started to counteract these evils of the officially-controlled system of public instruction. It proposed to promote—"Education, scientific, literary, and technical, on National lines, and under National control." But though owing its initiation to the threats of the Government to close the doors of the official schools and colleges and universities against those who would take any part—even to the extent of simply attending—in any political meeting or demonstration—the National Education Movement in Bengal sought to avoid all open causes of friction with the authorities, and professed to work independent of but not in opposition to the Government. Political in its origin it tried to avoid all conflicts with the authorities by assuming an absolutely non-political attitude.

The school of thought to which Aravinda belonged did not support this declaration of the National Council of Education, and could not appreciate this needless dread, as they thought, of offending official susceptibilities. But they had to accept the verdict of the majority. One of the most unfortunate things in modern public life is the dependence of all large public movement on the help and support of the wealthy classes in the community. Large and organised movements in our times cannot be carried on without large and substantial financial support; and the rich are not willing, as they were in the more primitive times, to lend their support to any institution without seeking to control it. This unfortunate condition lowers the intellectual and moral tone of many a public institution, which, though financed with the monies of the richer classes, would have been able, without their personal intervention or control, to keep up a very superior intellectual or moral standard. This is particularly injurious in comparatively primitive communities, where realised wealth has not yet had time to ally itself with high culture, and where, owing to the absence of a vigorous and free national life, it has but little incentive and lesser opportunities for cultivating such an alliance.

The Nationalists are a poor party in India, and the National Council of Education, though it owed its initiation to their efforts, passed, almost from the very beginning, beyond their sphere of influence, and Aravinda's position as the nominal head of the National College, practically controlled by men of different views and opinions, became almost from the very beginning more or less anomalous.

This was, from some point of view, very unfortunate. Aravinda had received the best modern education that any man of his country and generation could expect to have. He had for some years been a teacher of youth in Baroda, and had acquired considerable practical experience in his art. He had clearly realised the spirit and act of the life of his nation, and knew how the most advanced principles of modern pedagogy could be successfully worked into a thoroughly national system of education in India. He went to Calcutta as an educationist. He knew that the foundations of national independence and national greatness must be laid in a strong and advanced system of national education. He had a political ideal, no doubt; but politics meant to him much more than is ordinary understood by the term. It was not a game of expediency but a school of human character, and in to turn, reacting upon it, should develop and strengthen the manhood and womanhood of the nation. Education could no more be divorced from politics than it could be divorced from religion or morals. Any system of education that helps such isolation and division between the various organic relations of life, is medieval, and not modern. It is the education of the cloister—abstract and unreal; not the education of the modern man, eager to realise his fullest manhood in and through every relation of life. Aravinda is an apostle of modern education. Indeed, his ideal of modern education is even higher than what is understood by modern education ordinarily in Europe. It is a supremely spiritual ideal. Its aim is to actualise the highest and deepest God-consciousness of the human soul, in the outer life and appointments of human society. It was the temptation of having an open field for the realisation of this lofty educational ideal which brought Aravinda to Calcutta. Had he been given a free hand in the new National College there, that institution would have opened an altogether new chapter not only in the history of modern education in India, but perhaps in the whole world. To work the realism of the spirit of modern culture into the mould of the idealism of ancient theosophy, would not only secure for India her lost position as teacher of humanity, but would, perchance, even save modern civilisation from total collapse and destruction under the pressure of a gross and greedy industrialism.

But, unfortunately, neither individuals nor communities can easily break away from their own past. Most of the members of the new National Council of Education in Bengal were products of the old university. Some of the leading men in the new organisation had been closely associated, for many years, with the actual working out of the old vicious system. Steeped in the traditions of this old education, they could hardly be expected to thoroughly enter into the spirit of modern pedagogy. They were willing to give fair room to the new principles, as an experiment; but could hardly give them their absolute and whole-hearted support, as truths. It seemed to them like jumping into the unknown. While accepting the principle of National Education as education "on national lines" and "under national control," and, consequently, pledged not to accept any official aid, they were not free from the fear of possible official opposition, which, if once aroused, would make their work, they thought, absolutely impossible. They had a real dread of the Bureaucracy, and no strong confidence, really, in their own people. The dominating and declared ideal of the new Council, consequently, came to be not in any way to experiment, but only to supplement the existing Government and University system of education in the country. A timid, temporising spirit, altogether at variance with the new world, new visions and large ideas, generally guided the work of the National Council, and it made it almost impossible for Aravinda to throw himself heart and soul into his educational work in Calcutta. His place in the National College, though he was its nominal Principal, was not really that of organizer and initiator, but simply of a teacher of language and history, even as it had been in the Maharajah's College at Baroda. He had left Baroda in the hope of finding a wider scope of beneficent and patriotic activity in the new college in Calcutta. That hope was not realised. Almost from the very beginning he saw the hopelessness of working out a truly modern and thoroughly national system of education, through the organisation at whose service he had so enthusiastically placed himself.

But the man possessed by pure passion creates, where he cannot find them ready-made for him, his own instruments for the realisation of his supreme end in life. And wider fields of public usefulness were soon opened before Aravinda. The Nationalist School in Bengal was without a daily English organ. A new paper was started. Aravinda was invited to join its staff. A joint stock company was shortly floated to run it, and Aravinda became one of the directors. This paper—"Bande Mataram"—at once secured for itself a recognised position in Indian journalism. The hand of the master was in it from the very beginning. Its bold attitude, its vigorous thinking, its clear ideas, its chaste and powerful diction, its scorching sarcasm and refined witicism were unsurpassed by any journal in the country, either Indian or Anglo-Indian. It at once raised the tone of every Bengali paper, and compelled the admiration of even hostile Anglo-Indian editors. Morning after morning not only Calcutta, but the educated community almost in every part of the country, eagerly awaited its vigorous pronouncements on the stirring questions of the day. It even forced itself upon the notice of the callous and self-centred British press. Long extracts from it commenced to be reproduced week after week, even in the exclusive columns of the "Times" in London. It was a force in the country which none dared to ignore, however much they might fear or hate it, and Aravinda was the leading spirit, the central figure, in the new journal. The opportunities that were denied him in the National College he found in the pages of the "Bande Mataram," and from a tutor of a few youths he thus became the teacher of a whole nation.

A GREAT WORK OF HINDU RELIGION BHISMA;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilised world. This great Epic has been translated into almost all civilised languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties—religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI PARVAM of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvams.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS—THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST, SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis is great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy.
(2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads.
(3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. ## S. AUROBINDO GHOSHE'S SPEECH.

KRMAYOGIN.

Baba Aurobindo Ghose rose amidst loud cheers and said that when he consented to attend the meeting, he never thought that he would make any speech. In fact, he was asked by the organisers of the meeting simply to be present there. He was told that it would be sufficient if he came and took his seat there. Now he found his name among the speakers. The Chairman of the meeting, whose invitation was always on order, had called upon him to speak.

TWO REASONS FOR SILENCE.

He had two reasons as to why he ought not to speak. The first was that since he was again at liberty to address his countrymen he had made a good many speeches and he had exhausted everything that he had to say and he did not like to be always repeating the same thing from the platform. He was not an orator and what he spoke was only in the hope that some of the things he might say might go to the hearts of his countrymen and that he might see some effect of his speeches in their action. Merely to come again and again to the platform and the table was not a thing he liked. Therefore he preferred to see what his countrymen did.

Another reason was that unfortunately he was unable to address them in their mother language and therefore he always felt averse to inflict an English speech on a Bengalee audience.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

That evening he wished to speak only a few words because he owed an explanation to his friends. The form that his activities had taken after he had come from jail had disappointed a great many.

THE HARE STREET FRIEND.

There was first a great friend of his own and India's who lived in Hare Street—(laughter)—and he was very much disappointed by the form of his (the speaker's) activities. So great was this friend's anxiety for the Indians that that anxiety had cost him Rs. 15,000 (A voice: Another Rs. 7,500 as costs.) In his anxiety to help the Indians he followed the ancient maxim that truth meant only whatever was for the good of others. Unfortunately the Judge would not take that large view of the matter. And so our friend was silently suffering. (A voice: "Passive resistance.") (Laughter.) His friend said that he had heard that S. Aurobindo Ghose had promised to devote himself to literature and religion, and it was strange that Mr. Ghose should go to Jhalakati and make speeches on Swadeshi and boycott.

THE POLICE.

Another quarters he had disappointed with the police. (Laughter.) He had received a message from them saying that he was opening his mouth too much. He gave an interview to a press representative and told him something mainly about the food and accommodation in the government Hotel at Alipore. (Laughter.) He was immediately informed that that was a great indiscretion on his part and that it would bring trouble on him. When he went to Jhalakati the attentions of the police pursued him. They told the Barisal people and the local merchants that if he (speaker) was taken there the District Conference would be stopped.

They got the answer that that was not in the peoples hands, but the coming of Aurobindo Ghose was in their hands and Aurobindo Babu would come whatever the consequences of the Conference. And the Conference did take place. After his return he was again informed that he was qualifying for deportation—his fault was that he was appearing too much in public meetings. Some of the best loved workers in the country had already been deported and the first reason alleged was that they had been financing a revolution and troubling the peace of the country. When the Government in Parliament were heckled out of that position, it escaped as if by accident from one of the members that one very important reason for the deportation was that the deportees had taken part in the Swadeshi agitation. This was borne out by the suggestion he had received, and it seemed that it was by supporting the Swadeshi that they laid themselves open to deportation. Now, it was not like to be intimidated. It was only made him persist in doing his duty more obstinately, and if he spoke to-day, it was partly because of that friendly suggestion.

THE MADRAS FRIEND.

There were other friends who were nearer to us than those he had mentioned, but they also were dissatisfied with his activities. There was, for instance, a friend in Madras (“The Indian Patriot”) who invited him to give up politics and become a “Sanyasi.” This anxiety for his spiritual welfare somewhat surprised him at the time, but he was yet more surprised by the persistence of his friend's anxiety. One reason for suggesting inactivity to him was that he was imperilling his safety. That was a very singular reason to put before a public man for shirking his duty.

THE REFORMS.

Another reason for his Madras friend's advice was that he (speaker) was speaking against the reforms. It appeared that his (speaker) was guilty of a great error in throwing a doubt on the reality of the reforms. Whatever any offer was made to the country by the officials, it was a habit of his to look at it a little closely. It was a part of English politeness, and also a principle of their commerce that when a present was given or an article sold it was put in a very beautiful case and its appearance made very attractive. But his long residence in England had led him to know that there were a kind of goods, called Brummagem goods, and that was synonym for shoddy. He looked into the reforms and they seemed to him to belong to that class. Then there was another point. He was a little jealous of gifts from that quarter because the interest of the people and the officials were not the same. The position was such that if reforms give any increase and enlargement of the people's rights or rather a beginning in that direction—for at present the people had no real right or share in the government—any beginning of the kind meant a shrinking of bureaucratic powers. It was not likely that the officials would readily give up any power to which they cling. Therefore when reform was offered he always asked himself how far that was a real beginning of self-government or how far it was something given to them to draw their attention from their real path to salvation. It seemed to him that the reforms give them not the slightest real share in the government of the country, but instead they would merely throw an apple of fresh discord among them. They would only be a cause of the fresh strike and want of unity. Those who are led away by the reforms would not only diminish the powers of this country but led others into the wrong path.

THE POONA SPEECH.

Only 2 or 3 days ago, his fears were confirmed. Certain utterances had come from one from whom they were least expected—one who had served and made sacrifices for the country. He said that those who spread the gospel of Swaraj were mad men outside the limited asylum and those who preached passive resistance as a means of gaining Swaraj were liars who did not speak out their real thoughts to save their skin; he invited the country to denounce them as enemies of the country and of its progress and justified all that the Government had done by saying that the only attitude the Government could take was stern and heartless repression.

Well, if it were true that only fear made them take to passive resistance; if they flinched now from the boycott because some had been deported; if they ceased to proclaim the ideal of Swaraj; if they ceased to preach the boycott, then only it would be true that they had adopted an ideal that they could not reach and proclaim means of reaching it in which they did not believe, because they were anxious to save their skin.

He had heard many warnings recently that those who persisted in public agitation would be deported. For himself, and he was not a model of courage, residence for the best part of a year in a solitary cell had been an experience which took away all the terrors of deportation (Cheers.) If he had ever had any fear, the kindness of the authorities in giving him that experience had cured him of them. (Laughter.) He had found that with the ideal of Swaraj to uphold and the mantra of "Bande Mataram" in the heart, there was nothing so very terrible in jail or deportation. That was the first thing he would like to impress on them as the result of his experience. Imprisonment in a righteous cause was not so terrible as it seemed, suffering was not so difficult to bear as our anticipations made it out. The prize to which they aspired was the greatest to which a nation could aspire and if a price was asked of them, they ought not to shrink from paying it.

THE MIXED POLICY.

He was not afraid of deportations and imprisonment but he was afraid of the hand who patted them on the back and the voice that soothed. The mixed policy of repression and kindness was the thing he feared most. The whip was still there uplifted though it was not just now falling upon them, but the other hand was held out to stroke the head and soothe. This offer of conciliation in one hand and the pressure of repression in the other might have the effect of slackening their efforts and bewildering their intelligence. They must not forget that some of their most devoted workers were rotting in British jail under the name of deportation. What was the meaning of conciliation when men like Aswini Kumar Datta, Krishna Kumar Mitter and others were taken away from them and not released? What kind of conciliation was this which was offered us while this great wrong remained unremedied. Who could trust such a conciliation?

THE BOYCOTT

Let them not forget what they had set out to do when they declared the boycott. They had determined to undo the partition of Bengal. The partition still remained. So long as that remained, should they listen to the soothing voice? Should they give up the boycott or slacken the boycott? They had determined to revive the industries of their country. They had determined to save their countrymen from chronic starvation, but that had not yet been accomplished. Should they leave the boycott or slacken the boycott while it remained unaccomplished? Would the reforms save the country from that chronic starvation? When famine came the Government opened relief works as soon as its local officials could bring themselves to acknowledge that there was a famine in the land. That saved a number of lives, but it did not save us from the misery, the mortality, the thousands of ruined homes. That did not strike at the root of the chronic starvation and famine; Swadeshi and boycott alone could strike at the root. So long as the exploitation of the country by foreign trade remained, would they injure their country by giving up or slackening the boycott? Would they be faithful to the country if under such circumstances they were ready to listen to the soothing voice? If they did that, it would be because they could not bear the suffering and pay the price of raising up their country and they would prove themselves unworthy of the freedom to which they aspired. The time was a critical one and when the question was once more put to them they must always be ready to answer.

7TH OF AUGUST.

The 7th of August was very near. It was the birthday of the boycott, the birth day of the new spirit in India.

It was not much they had to do. Only once more to utter the sacred mantra of Bande Mataram, once more to declare that India was not lifeless, that Bengal was faithful to the vow she had made. He waited to see what would happen on that date in Bengal, whatever they would attend in their hundreds or in their thousands or in their tens of thousands. It was Bengal on which the burden of the struggle fell because she first had preached the Gospel, and she first had had the courage to bear suffering for the Gospel. Therefore God had given them the privilege to bear the greater part of the suffering. By so doing, he had shown a great love to waris Bengal. The fate of India was with the Bengalees. As they answered the question put to them, the future would be determined. It was not the first time the question had been put or the last time if would be put for it was not the crisis of a moment but a protracted struggle. The question was with them always and very moment their responsibility for answering it in the right sense remained with them. But especially on such a day as the seventh of August the responsibility was great. They waited to see what would be the answer to the question.

CONCLUSION.

But even if the response were less than he expected, even if the demoralisation he had heard of were real and there were a shrinkage in the numbers that attended that would not discourage him.

So long as in this country there were a few who had the courage of their faith, so long as there were even a few who were ready to proclaim their faith and live it, there was no fear for the ultimate triumph of the faithful.

It is described in the Christian Bible how the cult of the true faith was almost extinguished by persecution and all Israel turned from Jehovah to foreign idols, and even the chief prophet of the faith thought himself alone and hid his head. God called to him to go forth and strive with the priests of Baal. "Always" He said, "the nation I have chosen there are some who confess me and now too in this nation there are seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal. So always in this Bengal which God had chosen there would always be several thousands who would be true to the faith and never bow the knee to false gods. If the voices that proclaimed it were silenced, if the organisers were taken away, others would rise in their place, if those were taken, still others would come, if few, yet faithful. Some would always be left who would not be afraid to utter the name of their mother. Some would still preserve the faith and preach the gospel "Their was the blood of Raktabij. (Lugther and cheers.)" For their action sprang from no passing or material interest but from something that was imperishable and perennial. It was something which the fire could not burn and the sword could not kill; the winds of repression could not wither and all the waters could not drown. For all that there was a great importance in the nation's response on the 7th of August. On our action now it depended whether salvation come swiftly or were put off and the struggle and suffering prolonged for decades.

On their fidelity to Swadeshi, to Boycott, to passive resistance rested the hope of a peaceful and spiritual salvation. On that it depended whether India would give the example unprecedented in history of a revolution worked out by moral force and peaceful pressure. For on the 7th August the strength of the nation would be measured, not the numerical strength, but the moral strength which was greater than any physical. He appealed to the audience to see that no one of the thousands assembled remained absent on that day.

They must remember that it was a day of worship and consecration, when the mother looked upon her assembled children. She would ask on this 7th of August how many were faithful to her and whether after her centuries of affliction she had still years of suffering to endure, or by the love and strength of her children might expect the approaching hour of her felicity. If they were unfaithful now let them remember to whom they would be unfaithful,—to themselves, to their vows, to the future of their country, to God, to their mother.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Srijut Surendra Nath Banerji's Return.

The veteran leader of Moderate Bengal has returned from his oratorical triumphs in the land of our rulers. The ovations of praise and applause which appreciative audiences and newspaper critics of all shades of opinion have heaped upon him, were thoroughly deserved. Never has the great oratorical gift with which Srijut Surendranath is so splendidly endowed, been displayed to such faultless advantage as in these the crowning efforts of his old age. The usual defect of his oratory, an excess of language and rhetoric over substantial force, a defect which also limited Gladstone's oratory and made it the glory of an hour instead of an abiding possession to humanity, was absent from these speeches in England. For the first time the orator rose to the full height of a great and sound eloquence strong in matter as in style. With the statesman's part in the speeches we do not wholly agree. Nevertheless it must be accounted as righteousness to Srijut Surendranath that he enforced the Moderate Nationalist view of things,—a very different view from Mr. Gokhale's which is certainly not Nationalism and hardly even strong enough to be called Moderatism,—to its utmost limits and did not leave the English public under the vain delusion that some paltry tinkering with the Legislative Councils would satisfy the aspirations of an awakened India. His first speeches accepting the reforms were great blunders which might have done infinite harm, but his later utterances, however equivocal on this point, did much to redress the balance. We await with interest Srijut Surendranath's action in this matter. In our view the one policy for us is "No control, no co-operation," and in this we believe we are supported not only by the whole mass of advanced Nationalist opinion but by a great body of Moderates. The danger is that the older Moderates, trained in a much less exacting system of political agitation, may attempt to enforce the demand for control only in speech while in action conceding co-operation without control and thus giving away for some fancied and worthless advantage the vital position of the new movement. The reforms give no control, therefore the reforms must be rejected. Co-operation is our only asset, the only thing we can offer in exchange for control, the only thing by withholding which we can by pressure bring about the cession of control. It would be the height of political folly to give away our only asset for nothing.

A False Step.

Srijut Surendranath's maladroitness to the outrages when speaking at Bombay was a false step which he has since made some attempt to recover. However it be put, it was maladroitness and unnecessary. Any promise of co-operation in this respect implies an admission that we have the power to prevent these incidents and are therefore to some extent responsible either for bringing them about or for not stopping them before. It echoes the indiscretion by which Sir Edward Baker sought to make a whole nation responsible for these acts of recklessness and excuses the vindictive and headstrong utterances in which Mr. Gokhale tried to protect his own party and invoke the fiercest repression against his Nationalist countrymen. The isolated instances of assassination during the last year or more have been the reaction, deplorable enough, against the insane policy of indiscriminate police rule and repression which was started and progressively increased in the recent stages of the movement. Not by a single word or expression ought any public man to allow the responsibility to be shifted from the right quarter and to rest in the slightest degree on the people who had no part in them, no power to detect and stop the inflamed and resolute secret assassin and no authority given them by which they can bring about the removal of the real causes of the symptom. To dissociate oneself is a different matter. That should be done clearly, firmly and once for all.

A London Congress.

It is a pity that his oratorical triumphs in England seem to have blinded S. J. Surendranath to their small utility to the country. So far has he been led away by the slight and transient effect he has produced on the surface of the public mind in England that he is attempting to revive the old and futile idea of a Congress in London. Whether he will prevail on his fellow-Conventionalists to perpetrate this huge waste of money, we cannot say. The break-up of the Congress and the "stern and relentless repression" of the Nationalist party has delivered the old Congress Conservatives from the fear of public opinion. Needless to say, no so-called Congress held under such circumstances will be representative of the people. It is the old love of striking theatrical effects addressed to an English audience as patrons that has been revived in S. J. Surendranath by his visit. We notice that the dead cant about the faith in the sense of justice of the Government and the British Democracy once more reappears in the columns of the Bengalee. All these are bad signs. What is it that the Moderate Leader proposes to effect by this expenditure of money which might be so much better used in the country itself? We fail to see how a meeting of forty or fifty Indians, however eminent and respectable, prating about Indian grievances and the sense of justice of the British democracy or the immaculate Liberalism of Lord Morley can do any lasting service to the cause of India in England. Even if this could be turned into a really imposing theatricality, the effect of such shows in European countries is merely a nine days' wonder unless they are followed up. It is natural that an orator should overrate the effect of oratory, but S. J. Surendranath is surely aware that the greatest speeches or series of speeches unconnected with its own interests now produce on the blasé British public only the effect of a passing ripple which is immediately effaced by the next that follows. Either therefore his proposal means only some temporary theatricals and waste of money or he must persuade our people to resume the old abandoned policy and carry on a perennial campaign in England for the "education" of the British Public. Only as part of such a campaign had the proposal of a London Congress ever any meaning or justification. But even in its best days the Congress leaders could never produce enough men, money and energy for so stupendous a work, and it is doubly impossible now that the old policy is discredited. Certainly, if S. J. Surendranath thinks that the newly awakened energies of India are going to follow him in throwing themselves into this channel, he is grievously mistaken. Not all his prestige and influence can put back the hands of the clock so utterly. The Indian movement has really to deal not with the British democracy, which is an almost negligible factor in Indian affairs, but with the politicians in Parliament, His Majesty's ministers and the powerful influence in England of the official and commercial English out here. These are hard-headed and obstinate forces which, so far as they can at all rise out of the narrow groove of class interests or racial pride and prejudice, can only be influenced by one consideration, the best way to preserve the Empire in India. Even in the minds of Sir Henry Cotton and Mr. Mackarness that cannot fail to be a dominant consideration. If any educational work has to be done in England, it is to convince these classes that it is only by the concession of control that the co-operation of the Indian people can be secured. And that work is best done from India.

THE POWER THAT UPLIFTS.

Of all the great actors who were in the forefront of the Italian Revolution, Mazzini and Cavour were the most essential to Italian regeneration. Of the two Mazzini was undoubtedly the greater. Cavour was the statesman and organizer, Mazzini the prophet and creator. Mazzini was busy with the great and eternal ideas which move masses of men in all countries and various ages, Cavour with the temporary needs and circumstances of modern Italy. The one was an acute brain, the other a mighty soul. Cavour belongs to Italy, Mazzini to all humanity. Cavour was the man of the hour, Mazzini is the citizen of Eternity. But the work of Mazzini could not have been immediately crowned with success if there had been no Cavour. The work of Cavour would equally have been impossible but for Mazzini. Mazzini summed up the soul of all humanity, the idea of its past and the inspiration of its future, in Italian forms and gave life to the dead. At his breath the dead bones clothed themselves with flesh and the wilderness of poisonous brambles blossomed with the rose. Mazzini found Italy corrupt, demoralised, treacherous, immoral, selfish, wholly divided and incapable of union; he gave her the impulse of a mighty hope, a lofty spirituality, an intellectual impulse which despising sophistry and misleading detail went straight to the core of things and fastened on the one or two necessities, an ideal to live and die for and the strength to live and die for it. This was all he did, but it was enough. Cavour brought the old Italian statesmanship, diplomacy, practicality and placed it at the service of the great ideal of liberty and unity which Mazzini had made the overmastering passion of the millions. Yet these two deliverers and lovers of Italy never understood each other. Mazzini hated Cavour as a dishonest trickster and Machiavellian, Cavour scorned Mazzini as a fanatic and dangerous firebrand. It is easy to assign superficial and obvious causes for the undying misunderstanding and to say that the monarchist and practical statesman and the Utopian and democrat were bound to misunderstand and perpetually distrust and dislike each other. But there was a deeper cause.

The one thing which Mazzini most hated and from which he strove to deliver the hearts and imaginations of the young men of Italy was what he summed up in the word Machiavellianism. The Machiavellian is the man of pure intellect without imagination who, while not intellectually dead to great objects, does not make them an ideal but regards them from the point of view of concrete interests and is prepared to use in effecting them every means which can be suggested by human cunning or put into motion by unscrupulous force. Italian patriotism previous to the advent of Mazzini was cast in this Machiavellian mould. The Carbonari movement which was Italy's first attempt to live was permeated with it. Mazzini lifted up the country from this low and ineffective level and gave it the only force which can justify the hope of revival, the force of the spirit within, the strength to disregard immediate interests and surrounding circumstances and, carried away by the passion for an ideal, trusting oneself to the impetus and increasing velocity of the force it creates, to scorn ideas of impossibility and improbability and to fling life, goods and happiness away on the cast of dice already clogged against one by adverse Fortune and unfavourable circumstance. The spiritual force within not only creates the future but creates the materials for the future. It is not limited to the existing materials either in their nature or in their quantity. It can transform bad material into good material, insufficient means into abundant means. It was a deep consciousness of this great truth that gave Mazzini the strength to create modern Italy. His eyes were always fixed on the mind and heart of the nation, very little on the external or internal circumstances of Italy. He was not a statesman but he had a more than statesmanlike insight. His plan of a series of petty, local and necessarily abortive insurrections strikes the ordinary practical man as the very negation of common sense and political wisdom. It seems almost as futile as the idea of some wild brains, if indeed the idea be really cherished, that by random assassinations the freedom of this country can be vindicated. There is, however, a radical difference. Mazzini knew well what he was about. His eyes were fixed on the heart of the nation and as the physician of the Italian malady his business was not with the ultimate and perfect result but with the creation of conditions favourable to complete cure and resurgence. He knew final success was impossible without the creation of a force that could not be commanded for some time to come. But he also knew that even that force could not succeed without a great spiritual and moral strength behind its action and informing its aspirations. It was this strength he sought to create. The spiritual force he created by the promulgation of the mighty and uplifting ideas which pervade his writings and of which Young Italy was the organ. But moral force cannot be confirmed merely by ideas, it can only be forged and tempered in the workshop of action. And it was the habit of action, the habit of strength, daring and initiative which Mazzini sought to recreate in the torpid heart and sluggish limbs of Italy. And with it he sought to establish the sublime Roman spirit of utter self-sacrifice and self-abnegation, contempt of difficulty and apparent impossibility and iron insensibility to defeat. For his purpose the very hopelessness of the enterprises he set on foot was more favourable than more possible essays. And when others and sometimes his own heart reproached him with flinging away so many young and promising lives into the bloody trench of his petty yet impossible endeavours, the faith and wisdom in him upheld him in the face of every discouragement. Because he had that superhuman strength, he was permitted to uplift Italy. Had it been God's purpose that Italy should become swiftly one of the greater European powers, he would have been permitted to free her also. He would have done it in a different way from Cavour's,—after a much longer lapse of time, with a much more terrible and bloody expense of human life but without purchasing Italy's freedom in the French market by the bribe of Savoy and Nice and with such a divine output of spiritual and moral force as would have sustained his country for centuries and fulfilled his grandiose dream of an Italy spiritually, intellectually and politically leading Europe.

The work was given to Cavour precisely because he was a lesser man. Mazzini saw in him the revival of Machiavellianism and the frustration of his own moral work. He was wrong, but not wholly wrong. The temper and methods of Cavour were predominately Machiavellian. He resumed that element in Italian character and gave it a triumphant expression. Like the Carbonari he weighed forces, gave a high place to concrete material interests, attempted great but not impossible objects and by means which were bold but not heroic, used diplomacy, temporising and shuffling with a force of which they were incapable and unlike them did not shrink from material sacrifices. He succeeded where they failed, not merely because he was a great statesman, but because he had learnt to cherish the unity and freedom of Italy not as mere national interests but as engrossing ideals. The passion greater than a man's love for child and wife which he put into those aspirations and the emotional fervour with which he invested his Liberal ideal of a free Church in a free State, measure the spiritual gulf between himself and the purely Machiavellian Carbonari. It was this that gave him the force to attempt greatly and to cast all on the hazard of a single die. He had therefore the inspiration of a part of the Mazzinian gospel and he used the force which Mazzini created. Without it he would have been helpless. It was not Cavour who saved Italy, it was the force of resurgent Italy working through Cavour. History often misrepresents and it formerly represented the later part of the Revolution as entirely engineered by his statecraft, but it is now recognised that more than once in the greatest matters Cavour planned one away and the great Artificer of nations planned in another. But Cavour had the greatest gift of a statesman, to recognise that events were wiser than himself and throwing aside his attachment to the success of his own schemes to see and use the advantages of a situation he had not foreseen. This gift Mazzini, the fanatic and doctrinaire, almost entirely lacked. Still the success of Cavour prolonged in the Italian character and political action some of the lower qualities of the long-enslaved nation and is responsible for the reverses, retardations and deep-seated maladies which keep back Italy from the fulfilment of her greatness. Mazzini, with his superior diagnosis of the national disease and his surgeon's pitilessness, would have probed deeper, intensified and prolonged the agony, but made a radical cure.

The circumstances in India forbid the use of the same means as the Italians used. But the general psychological laws which govern nations in their rise, greatness, decline and resurgence are always the same. The freedom we seek in India may be different in its circumstances from Italian freedom, the means to be used are certainly different, but the principle is the same. The old patriotism of the nineteenth century in India was petty, unscrupulous, weak, full of insincerities, concealments, shufflings, concerned with small material interests not with great ideals, though not averse to looking intellectually and from far-off at great objects. It had neither inspiration nor truth nor statesmanship. Nationalism has done part of the work of a Mazzini by awakening a great spiritual force in the country and giving the new generation great ideals, a wide horizon of hope and aspiration, an intense faith and energy. It has sought like Mazzini to raise up the moral condition of the nation to the height of love, strength, self-sacrifice, constancy under defeat, unwearied and undaunted persistence, the habit of individual and organised action, self-reliance and indomitable enterprise; but it has rejected the old methods of insurrectionary violence and replaced them by self-help and passive resistance. That work is not yet complete. Only when it is complete will it be possible for a strength to be generated in the country which the past represented by the bureaucracy will consent to recognise as the representative of the future and to abdicate in its favour by a gradual cession of powers. It is our hope that as the work has begun, so it will continue in the spirit of Nationalism and not only the political circumstances of India be changed but her deeper diseases be cured and by a full evocation of her immense stores of moral and spiritual strength that be accomplished for India which Mazzini could not accomplish for Italy, to place her in the head and forefront of the new world whose birth-throes are now beginning to convulse the Earth.

CHAPTER II.

1. Yama said. "The Unborn who is not devious-minded hath a city with eleven gates; when He taketh a abode in it He grieveth not, but when He is set free from it, that is His deliverance. This is the thing thou seekest.

2. Lo, the Swan whose dwelling is in the purity, He is the Vasu in the interregions, the Sacrificer at the altar, the Guest in the vessel of the drinking; He is in man and in the Great Ones and His home is in the Law and His dwelling is in the firmament; He is all that is born of water and all that is born of earth and all that is born of the mountains. He is the Truth and He is the Mighty One.

3. This is He that draweth the main breath upward and casteth the lower breath downward. The Dwarf that sitteth in the centre, to Him all the Gods do homage.

4. When this encased spirit that is in the body falleth away from it, when He is freed from its casing, what is there then that remaineth? This is the thing thou seekest.

5. Man that is mortal liveth not by the breath, no, nor by the lower breath; but by something else we live in which both these have their being.

6. Surely, O Gautama, I will tell thee of this secret and eternal Brahman and likewise what becometh of the soul when one dieth.

7. For some enter a womb to the embodying of the Spirit and others follow after the Immovable; according to their deeds is their goal and after the measure of their revealed knowledge.

8. This that waketh in the sleepers creating desire upon desire, this Purusha, Him they call the Bright One, Him Brahman, Him Immortality, and in Him are all the worlds established; none goeth beyond Him, This is the thing thou seekest.

9. Even as one Fire hath entered into the world but it shapeth itself to the forms it meeteth, so there is one Spirit within all creatures but it shapeth itself to form and form; it is likewise outside these.

10. Even as one Air hath entered into the world but it shapeth itself to the forms it meeteth, so there is one Spirit within all creatures but it shapeth itself to form and form; it is likewise outside these.

11. Even as the Sun is the eye of all this world, yet it is not soiled by the outward blemishes of the visual, so there is one Spirit within all creatures, but the sorrow of this world soils it not, for it is beyond grief and his danger.

12. One calm and controlling Spirit within, all creatures that maketh one form into many fashions; the calm and strong who see Him in the self as in a mirror, theirs is eternal felicity and 'tis not for others.

13. The One Eternal in many transient, the One Conscious in many conscious beings, who being One ordereth the desires of many; the calm and strong who behold Him in the self as in a mirror, theirs is eternal peace and 'tis not for others.

14. "This is He," is all they can realise of Him, a highest felicity which none can point to nor any define it. How shall I know of Him whether He shineth or reflecteth one light and another?

15. There the Sun cannot shine and the moon has no lustre; all the stars are blind; there our lightnings flash not neither any earthly fire. For all that is bright is but the shadow of His brightness and by His shining all this shineth.

CHAPTER I.

Continued.

The wife, Kalyani, gave up thinking and went to the cowshed to milk the cow; then she warmed the milk, fed her child and went again to give the cow its grass and water. When she returned from her task Mohendra said, "How long can we go on in this way?"

"Not long," answered Kalyani, "as long as we can. So long as possible I will keep things going, afterwards you and the girl can go to the town."

Mohendra. "If we have to go to the town at the end, why should I inflict all this trouble on you at all? Come, let us go at once."

After much arguing and contention between husband and wife, Kalyani said, "Will there be any particular advantage in going to the town?"

Mohendra. "Very possibly that place too is as empty of men and empty of means of subsistence as we are here."

Kalyani. "If you go to Murshidabad, Cassimbazar, or Calcutta, you may save your life. It is in every way better to leave this place."

Mohendra, answered, "This house has been full for many years of the gathered wealth of generations. All this will be looted by thieves."

Kalyani, "If thieves come to loot it, shall we two be able to protect the treasure? If life is not saved who will be there to enjoy? Come, let us shut up the whole place this moment and go. If we survive, we can come back and enjoy what remains."

"Will you be able to do the journey on foot?" asked Mohendra. "The palanquin-bearers are all dead. As for cart or carriage, where there are bullocks there is no driver and where there is a driver there are no bullocks."

Kalyani, "Oh, I shall be able to walk, do not fear."

In her heart she thought, even if she fell and died on the way, these two at least would be saved.

The next day at dawn the two took some money with them, locked up room and door, let loose the cattle, took the child in their arms and set out for the capital. At the time of starting Mohendra said, "The road is very difficult, at every step dacoits and highwaymen are hovering about, it is not well to go empty-handed." So saying Mohendra returned to the house and took from it musket, shot, and powder.

When she saw the weapon, Kalyani said, "Since you have remembered to take arms with you, hold Sukumari for a moment and I too will bring a weapon with me." With the words she put her daughter into Mohendra's arms and in her turn entered the house.

Mohendra called after her, "Why, what weapon can you take with you?"

As she came, Kalyani hid a small casket of poison in her dress. Fearing what fate might befall her in these days of misfortune, she had already procured and kept the poison with her.

It was the month of Jyaishta, a savago heat, the earth as if a flame, the wind scattering fire, the sky like a canopy of heated copper, the dust of the road like sparks of fire. Kalyani began to perspire profusely. Now resting under the shade of a pabla-tree, now sitting in the shelter of a date-palm, drinking the muddy water of dried ponds, with great difficulty she journeyed forward. The girl was in Mohendra's arms and sometimes he fanned her with his robe. Once the two refreshed themselves, seated under the boughs of a creeper-covered tree flowering with odorous blooms and dark-hued with dense shade-giving foliage. Mohendra wondered to see Kalyani's endurance under fatigue. He drenched his robe with water from a neighbouring pool and sprinkled it on his and Kalyani's face, forehead, hands and feet.

Kalyani was a little cooled and refreshed, but both of them were distressed with great hunger. That could be borne, but the hunger and thirst of their child could not be endured, so they resumed their march. Swimming through those waves of fire they arrived before evening at an inn. Mohendra had cherished a great hope that on reaching the inn he would be able to give cool water to his wife and child to drink and food to save their lives. But he met with a great disappointment. There was not a man in the inn. Big rooms were lying empty, the men had all fled. Mohendra after looking about the place made his wife and daughter lie down in one of the rooms. He began to call from outside in a loud voice, but got no answer. Then Mohendra said to Kalyani, "Will you have a little courage and stay here alone? If there is a cow to be found in this region, may Sri Krishna have pity on us and I shall bring you some milk." He took an earthen waterjar in his hand and went out. A number of such jars were lying about the place.

II.

To know Truth and interpret it to man, such perfect concentration of the mind is necessary. Bacon, Plato, Kant, Hegel and Sankaracharya are Yogees of this intellectual type. Whether in Art, Science or any other intellectual domain, we have evidence of this kind of mental exercise.

This Yoga requires as much practice as any other. The man that has self control can alone accomplish this feat of uniting all the scattered powers of the mind and can concentrate them in one continued mental act.

We know from individual experience and historical evidence that such mental abstraction is possible.

We all know how Archimedes was immersed in mathematical calculations and lost his life. The case of Sir Isaac Newton and his pet dog Diamond is another instance of such mental Yoga. The absolute self-forgetfulness of the very deeply engaged chessplayer and the man of science, such as Edison and others, is also a very wellknown instance. In reveries, the mind takes no cognisance of the world, but flows out in a certain direction according to its own sweet will. The senses lose their functions for the time being. The mind does not, then, keep within the strict bounds of time and space. An expert musician carries us out of ourselves. When a sudden and strange music breaks the stillness of the night and rouses echo from out of her slumber, the raven down of darkness itself seems to be smoothed, and we leap out of our beds and rush to our windows. We lift our fingers and are all ears. We take in the strains with pleased attention. All our other senses are lulled to sleep, as it were, for the time being and we are "lapped in Elysium," "fancy-free."

We notice this mental abstraction in persons subject to any violent passion. In anger, we do not mind a deep gash on our side, from a deadly weapon. We are bent on wreaking vengeance. We forget all pains and injuries in pursuing the object we have in view. A loving mother will gladly rush into flames to rescue her child, dearer to her than her own life-blood. She may be scorched, and burned but the one overwhelming thought of saving her little dear one is predominant in her mind and she forgets the flames. Even she-bears and tigresses forget forest-fires, while trying to save their young ones. The story of Billamangal and that of Laila Majnoo are well-known. We thus see clearly how in moments of the deepest concentration, we can forget the world of matter. The mind is deeply immersed in one thought or subject, and can say "get thee behind me," to everything else, at least, for the time being.

Some are born Yogees. Newton was one such Yogi. But all are not so. It is possible for every one, to a limited extent, to be an intellectual Yogi, that is, one who can hold the reins firmly on one's mental faculties and can make an united mental effort to master any subject on which one's attention is set. It is a matter of exercise, practice, education. Educate, the faculties properly and you become an intellectual Yogi, in your own little way. Every student is such a Yogi, for study is Yoga,—"Tapasya" to the student.

But it is impossible to devote our mental powers to a subject which has no interest for us. We can only do so, when the subject vitally interests us. Intense curiosity or interest whets the intellect, calls forth its highest energies and efforts, and enables it to grasp a theme that it would otherwise fail to grapple with and overcome.

We have to learn the process. Like the Wrestler, we come to success and power through a thousand falls. Let not our failures dishearten us at the beginning.

Blessed is the man who can believe. Belief is a great power. It vitalises, energises our drooping nerves. If we have a mustard seed of faith and say to this mountain, "Be thou removed and cast into the sea," it shall be removed and cast into the sea. Believe in the falls, more than in success. Through failures, we come to success. We rise, only after falls, not without them or before! We come to Heaven, after we have seen hell for and worked out the evil effects of our own Karma. Hell falls away, as Heaven grows in us. We shall have to pay to the uttermost farthing. We must pay our way even in this matter of Yoga. Nothing shall be had unpaid for. We must give up some of our pleasures and vices, in order to practise Yoga. We must sacrifice bad habits in order to acquire this good habit of Yoga.

Memory is a faculty of the mind that can only be acquired by the closest attention. It can be cultivated and improved when there is a tendency to forget. Mentally repeat the same ideas as many times as you can. Let other ideas suggest, by the law of association of ideas, what you would generally forget! And your memory will perform unexpected feats. Attention, "Muno-yoga" and Memory are very nearly related to each other.

What interests the thoughtful man more than general facts and laws? On them has the mind of man been exercised ever since the intellectual history of mankind began. That which is of local or passing interest is not a theme, to be handled by great intellectual giants. Little things are left to little souls. They have no charms for the great. Little conceits are for pigmies. Titans must have universal, Titanic and permanent themes for treatment. Man can not only unite his own individual powers and faculties within himself, but can unite socially, racially, nationally and internationally, in intellectual commercial and other pursuits. The members of the Royal society and the like, unite, in intellectual operations, men from all parts of the world, to clean the Augean stables of human ignorance. In these days, we meet with clubs and societies, at every step. They are the signs of the times. No one can neglect them. Men have been roused from the lethargy of ages to a sense of the stupendous dimensions of the work before them. Man has felt now, more than even, that he must not only have Yoga in himself, but with all the rest of the world; that he can not accomplish the great task before him without the help of his brother man.

HEMENDRANATH SINHA,

The Crime of Colour.

—ooo—

One James Knight, an Australian, has just been sentenced at Pretoria to two months' simple imprisonment pending his deportation from the Transvaal as an undesirable. During the trial evidence was given of previous convictions for house-breaking and theft at Somerset and obtaining money under false pretences at Maritzburg. Thus it would appear that James Knight is a branded criminal. Yet he is leniently treated by the Court. Is it because he is a white man? The Indian passive resisters, on the other hand, even men of light and leading, are made to do scavenging work in the streets, are half-starved in jail, and are beaten and flogged by warders when their weary and unaccustomed limbs fail to do the required amount of "hard labour" with the spade or the broom! Is it because their complexion is brown? What other explanation can the Colonial Hazaras give of the startling contrast between the "simple imprisonment" of the Australian house-breaker and cheat and the barbarous treatment that is being accorded to His Majesty's subject for refusing to submit to an unjust and un-British law?

With Mrs. Annie Besant and these of her countrymen who are so eager to instill into the Indian mind a "love for the Empire" and a "proper idea" of the "white man's benevolence" kindly tell us why British subjects of a darker complexion are treated like branded criminals for claiming a reasonable share of the privileges of "the Empire," and why branded criminals of a paler hue are treated with special consideration by the same courts of law that feel no scruple in condemning men like Mr. Gandhi to scavenging work in the streets of Volksrust? Has Lord Morley, who has lent his enthusiastic support to Sir William Lee-Warner's scheme for interpreting "British political principles" to Indian students, taken the trouble to enquire into the horrid revelations made in Mr. Gandhi's letters regarding the treatment of Indian passive resisters in British South African jails? Has his Lordship taken any notice of the death of an Indian passive resister in the beggining of July last through alleged ill-treatment in the Johannesburg Jail? Why have not Sir William Lee-Warner, Mr. Rees, Sir Edmund Cox, and other well-wishers of India anything to say regarding the facts of the case as given in the Pretoria Press and other South African journals and the death certificate of a white doctor who attended the unfortunate deceased? The facts of the case are revolting in the extreme. Veeramuthoo, who was sentenced to 14 days hard labour for hawking without a licence, made a statement on solemn oath before Mr. W. S. Cohn, Justice of the Peace, from which we take the following:

At the camp we received no other food than mealie-pap. When we asked for rice the chief warden told us that there was plenty of grass outside. We were allowed only one blanket and mat per man, although in the tents it was bitterly cold. We were treated with extreme roughness by the native warders placed in charge over us, who pushed us and struck us without the slightest provocation. I and my fellow prisoners were not allowed water for washing or cleaning our teeth before eating, which is enjoined by our religion, during the whole term of our imprisonment. On Tuesday, the 29th June, in the morning, I took my blanket outside, after folding it, as is usual when I was struck with a stick by a native warden, whose name I do not know, the blow tearing a piece of flesh from my thumb, which has not yet healed.

The above is a sample of the general treatment accorded to our countrymen in South African jails for the crime of vindicating their rights as British subjects in a British Colony. The deceased Nagappan, a lad of eighteen, could bear it no longer, and became very ill. Veeramuthoo reported the matter to the chief warder, but that worthy did not believe him and sent the unfortunate boy back to his work. What followed is thus stated by his fellowprisoner:—

When I returned at 12 o'clock Nagappan told me that he had been struck a fearful blow about the body with a jamlok by Johannes and that he was very ill. The next day (Sunday) he could not take any food. On Monday Nagappan looked as if he would die, and supporting him, I took him to the chief warder, whom I informed that the boy had not had any food for two days that he was very ill, and that he could not work. The chief warder then asked me for how long the boy was sentenced and when I replied that his term was for 10 days, and that he would be released on Wednesday, he exclaimed Let him die like the other—."Addressing the boy, he said, "Take a pick and shovel and go with the others on the road." The boy then went with us to work, we carrying his tools and supporting him all the way.

These sickening facts were corroborated by another Indian prisoner Moodalay in his statement before the Justice of the Peace. Dr Godfrey's certificate is quoted below:—

This is to certify that I attended Nagappan during his last illness since July 1, 1909. He had just come out of the goal. From the first I saw that he had no hope. If the history that he gave me prior to his death be true, I am of opinion that the Register of Deaths should hold some sort of an inquest. And the Attorney-General should be notified as to the treatment the sick prisoners receive at the different gaol compounds. In my opinion, the boy's death has been accelerated by the conduct of the gaol officials, if all is true. Cause of death: Primary, acute double pneumonia; second, heart failure. Duration of disease nine days. BRUISES ALL OVER THE BODY.

Let believers in the "Empire" idea take note!—The Panjabee.

THE RAMKRISHNA HOME OF SERVICE, BENARES.

The Eighth Annual Report of the Ramkrishna Home of Service, Benares, is a record of relief afforded to the suffering poor of the City. It is a highly philanthropic work, done silently and nobly, and the spirit, the method and the organisation are unique in their kind. Whoever goes through the report will be struck with the noble principle actuating the whole organisation—that of serving humanity as an act of worship. The accounts of the Home bear eloquent testimony to the disinterested motive and self-sacrifice of the workers, as every farthing collected in the name of the poor went to relieve their distress.

The total number of persons, consisting of men, women and children belonging to every province of India and of all castes and creeds, who were served during the year under report, was 3044. It indicates the catholic character of the charitable work which the Ramkrishna Home of Service is carrying on. The number of patients treated in the Home Hospital during the year was 1406. Mr. E. C. Radice I. C. S. C. I. E. Magistrate of Benares, in his annual presidential address, truly remarked that the institution although limited in accommodation, relieved cases for which accommodation is made in no other place. Mr Arundale, vice-principal of the Central Hindu College, Benares, spoke of this institution as "the noblest of all charitable works Benares has to show." Any one visiting Benares would, we are sure, bear similar testimony to the good work done by the Home of Service. We are glad to notice that the institution has, during the last year received generous support in aid of its Hospital fund from several kindhearted gentlemen. The Home of Service is in urgent need of the Hospital which it is building for the accommodation of its daily increasing diseased and homeless poor but has been obliged to discontinue the work owing to want of funds. The whole cost of the building was estimated at Rs. 38000. Funds already promised and subscribed are just sufficient to cover the construction of the out-door dispensary, the office room, five general wards and three infectious wards. But one small general ward, workers quarters, kitchen, servants quarters, privies, bath rooms, the gate, the gateway and the morgue are still unprovided for. The Home appeals to the public for the sum of Rs. 14000 - which is still necessary for the completion of the Hospital Buildings. An institution so noble and humanitarian and so urgently needed in a place like Benares should not be allowed to be hampered in its benevolent work for want of necessary funds. The generous public would find that every farthing contributed towards this charitable work would be none worthily spent. We join the Home in its appeal to the sympathetic public to strengthen its hand in this hour of need.

N. B. - All contributions should be sent to the Assistant Secretary R. K. Home of Service, Ramapura, Benares city.

COTTON GOODS TRADE.—

The Monthly Record of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce has published the statistics of cotton exports of yarn and cloth to the East during the months ending 31st May 1909 and in the corresponding twelve months ending May 1906, 1907, 1908. We give some figures below, which will be interesting, from the standpoint of Swadeshi-boycott. The figures are in millions of lbs. and millions of yards.

	Plain Cottons—yards.
	1909	1908	1907	1906
Bombay	270.0	397.0	416.0	422.0
Calcutta	920.0	1075.0	1059.0	1174.0
Karachi	132.0	229.0	176.0	150.0
	Dyed and Coloured Cottons—yards.
	1909	1908	1907	1906
Bombay	58.7	60.2	81.7	83.5
Calcutta	46.7	61.0	57.4	70.1
Karachi	29.9	46.9	32.4	41.2
	Printed Cottons—yards.
	1909	1908	1907	1906
Bombay	86.6	126.0	125.6	125.5
Calcutta	49.5	73.0	48.0	66.5
Karachi	47.9	64.8	67.1	63.4

These figures will show that the imports into India of foreign cotton goods have decreased during the last four years. The imports in Ceylon and Madras show very slight increase but that does not go to make up the heavy deficit in other parts. It might be contended by anti-Swadeshi-Boycotters that this deficit in the imports is due solely to the general depression everywhere. But it is a remarkable thing that the depression did not affect the imports of Twist; on the other hand they have been growing. Besides in the years of general depression of trade, the Indian mills did not materially suffer, but increased in number and in their output. That is the result of the Swadeshi-boycott movement. The movement created a large demand for Indian goods; and it was owing to this demand that the mills were working steadily and escaped collapse owing to the general depression. —Mahratta.

DREAD OF THE "SVARJ".—

The "Maharatta" says the Committee of the Poona General Library of which Dr. R. G. Bhandarkar is Vice-President passed a resolution some days ago to exclude from the library Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal's paper "Svaraj." A general meeting of subscribers of the library, however, passed a resolution that the paper should be subscribed for. Dr. Bhandarkar has thereupon resigned his office in the library and Rao Bahadur Joshi his membership on the Committee.

A FARIDPUR TEACHER DISMISSED.—

Srijiit Kali Prasanna Ghose, third teacher, Faridpore Ishan Entrance School, has been dismissed for taking part in Boycott demonstrations and leading boys in picketting expeditions.

UNUSUAL INTEREST.—

Only one witness representing the landholders has appeared before Mr. Butterworth now sitting in Madras to record the opinions of the community in connection with the scheme of election to the councils by landholders and Mahomedans. A zemindar of Bhadrachalam, in Godavary district, said he was in favour of nominations to the councils by Government for the simple and incontrovertible reason that the sound and impartial judgment of Government and its officers was a thousand times more valuable for the safe conduct of the administration of the country at the present time than the opinions of men who do not possess or require political information.

COUNCIL REFORM.—

A draft of the proposed constituencies for the Northern Central and Southern Division of the Presidency and City of Bombay for the election of Muslim members of the new Councils has been received by the Anjuman-Islam, Bombay, for its opinion. A reply is requested within a week. The draft is as follows:—The electorate for Muslim elections in the constituencies of the Northern, Central and Southern Divisions shall consist of the following persons:—(1) All Justices of the Peace. (2) All Honorary Magistrates. (3) All landholders paying not less than Rs. 100 as land-revenue. (4) All persons assessed to income tax on Rs. 1000 or more. (5) All graduates of recognised Universities in the British Empire. (6) All holders of titles conferred by Government. In the case of Bombay City for (3) and (4) of above shall be substituted following. (3) All landholders paying not less than Rs. 500 as land-revenue. (4) All persons assessed to income tax on Rs. 2000 or more.

THE ALIPORE BOMB CASE.—

In the hearing of the appeals in the above case in the High Court Mr. C. E. Dase said on the 17th—"My lords, before I proceed to deal with the case I beg to bring to your Lordships' notice the fact that one of the appellants before your Lordships died last night and that is Asoke chandra Nandi. He was arrested at 134 Harrison Road and was tried in the High Court under the Arms Act for the fact that bombs were found at 124. He was subsequently acquitted of that charge and in spite of that acquittal proceedings against him under section 121 were continued before Mr. Birley. Further in spite of the clear finding of Mr. Birley that the evidence did not establish any connection between Asoke Chandra Nandi and the garden the bail was refused throughout and the learned Sessions Judge admitted him to bail after argument and eventually he convicted him basing largely on the statement of Narendra Nath Mullick. Thereafter we made repeated applications for bail on the ground that he was suffering from phthisis with which he was attacked while in jail. All those applications were refused. We eventually made an application to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and His Honour admitted him to bail. So far as this case is concerned his case goes out. If he had been alive, I am confident I would have been able to prove to your Lordships that not only he was not guilty but he was innocent of all the charges."

The attitude of the Government as regards section 121 I. P. C. will be clear from the following statements and comments on the 14th August:—

Mr. Norton, for the Crown, said that with regard to the charge under Section 121 he had had a consultation with the Government and his instructions were to leave the matter to their lordships. They desired him not to withdraw the charge under Section 121, for two reasons among others. In the first place it involved a charge against Indra Nath Nundy, who was one of those charged in the second batch, and against whom no such defects could be argued as in regard to the first batch. The second reason was that the Government were anxious that, if possible, there should be a decision upon the various questions of law involved here, which would be extremely important both for present as well as for future guidance.

The Chief Justice: They do not instruct you to argue this point?

Mr. Norton: I may frankly state that it was not their intention on the 17th May to include Section 121, because they had not then all the materials with regard to Section 121 before them to enable them to come to a definite pronouncement. It was only later on that they came into possession of full particulars.

The Chief Justice: Then may it in this way? The Government do not desire you either to withdraw the charge or not to withdraw them, but not their intention to sanction complaint under Section 121 on the 17th May.

Mr. Norton. Yes.

Dated Chinsurah

11th August 1909.

Dear Sir,

With Reference to your letter dated the 25th July 1909.

I am to state that it is proposed to run the Hugli conference on the old lines i. e. on the lines of Pabna Conference. So it is not necessary for any association to be affiliated to the Bengal Provincial congress committee to be able to elect delegates to the conference.

I am also to request you to proceed to the election of delegates at once and send in their names to the secretary on or before the 15th inst.

Yours faithfully

LALA KANHAYAL ON THE "CONGRESS".—

Lala Kanhyal, pleader of the Lahore Chief Court Bar and one of the oldest Congressmen in the Province, in course of a letter to the Tribune declares "in the present state of the country it was highly advisable to lay down the aims and objects of the Congress and that people should join the Congress and being in it, should fight in support of their opinions and create a majority if they can." It is no good, he declares, to find fault with the Congress from outside. He attempts to refute the theory that the Congress has been a self-inflicted evil to the Hindu community and dwells at length on the enormous good work done by the Congress. He says, he is in favour of joining and helping the Congress but he deprecates interference of Government in the Exhibition. The Congress authorities, in his opinion, ought to have done what they could without troubling Government and in that case would have taught the people a lesson in self-help.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES IN THE PUNJAB.

In the Report on the working of Joint Stock Companies in the Punjab for 1908-09 the Registrar records that the Companies with share capital now number 128 as against 96 last year and 60 eight years ago. This is an unprecedented increase and indicates that a 'boom' in Company promoting has set in which will sensibly affect in one way or another the prosperity of the Province. The nominal capital is about 485 lakhs as against 337 lakhs last year and 157 lakhs in 1900-1901; and the paid up capital 149 lakhs as against 139 and 73, respectively. It will be seen that while the nominal capital has increased since last year by 44 per cent. the paid up capital has increased by only 7 per cent.; further, the paid up capital is 31 per cent. of the nominal, whereas last year it was 41 per cent. It would appear therefore that with an increase in numbers and capital there has not been a corresponding improvement in financial stability. Forty-two new companies were registered during the year. No less than 12 banking and three insurance companies were started with a capital of nearly 77 lakhs, of which 16 per cent. only was paid up. There were 14 new trading companies with diverse objects and five mills. Two tobacco companies were formed at Lahore and a coal company at Sialkot. Ten companies became defunct, including two of those newly started which never commenced business. Of these the most important were the Punjab Motor Transport Company and the Himalaya Glass Works. The Ambala People's Bank, which was started by an enterprising Extra Assistant Commissioner with the object of financing Co-operative Credit Societies, failed because there were no Co-operative Credit Societies in the Ambala District to finance. Seven companies, mostly banks, have increased their nominal capital by 24 lakhs. The largest increase is in the Punjab National Bank (10 lakhs). This company has also a large increase of paid up capital (Rs. 94,000). Other notable increases of paid up capital are in the case of the Punjab Co-operative Bank (2½ lakhs). And the Century Flour Mills (over 1½ lakhs). Registration fees amounted to Rs. 11,045, the highest total on record. Last year the total was Rs. 6,427.

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1 The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilized languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2 His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world:—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties,—religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI Parvan of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvans.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS—THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis his great Religion stands.

- (1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy.
- (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads.
- (3) Sankhya Philosophy.
- (4) Yoga Philosophy.
- (5) Nyaya Philosophy.
- (6) Vaisheshika.
- (7) Mimamsa Philosophy.
- (8) Vedanta Philosophy.
- (9) Jaina Philosophy.
- (10) Buddhist Philosophy.
- (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies.
- (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. ## THE PHILOSOPHY OF INDIAN ART.

BY DR. ANANDA K. COOMARASWAMY, D. Sc

MR. E. B. Havell, for ten years Principal of the Calcutta School of Art, and perhaps the only Englishman possessing any adequate knowledge of Indian Art, has remarked that "In India there has been, during the last hundred years, a continuous decline of public taste, so that at the present time the educated Indians probably stand behind the rest of the world in artistic understanding." Italics are mine. I suppose there could not be stronger evidence of the baneful character of 'English' education, as now understood in India, than the undisputable fact, that the great majority of persons so 'educated' not only know nothing of the art of their own country, but are absolutely unable to appreciate this most characteristic expression of their own culture even when their attention is called to its existence. They have indeed become strangers in their own land.

Such 'educated' persons, remonstrated with, reply that "perhaps the Gandhara sculptures are of some importance, but these were done under Greek influence; all really important art came from the West then, as it does now." Upon this principle the Schools of Art in India have generally acted. So ingrained is this point of view in the minds of Indians also, that when, as the result of Mr. Havell's sympathetic comprehension and foresight, the European pictures at the Calcutta School of Art were some years ago sold off, and the valuable collection of Indian paintings now there, began to replace them, there was a loud outcry from the Nationalist leaders; "Once more we are betrayed," they cried, "Government is robbing us of the opportunity of progress; it is another part of a deliberate scheme to keep us in the dark." A little healthy prejudice in favour of things Indian, merely because they are Indian, would be preferable to such blindness. For, once for all let it be said, Indian art is an expression of Indian culture, of the same order of importance as Indian music and literature, each in its own direction a supreme achievement of humanity.

But there yet remains to be written a 'Nature of Indian' that shall be to modern India and to the West, what Ruskin's 'Nature of Gothic' was to Victorian England. Both the achievement and the philosophy of Indian Art are still almost unknown, and are ignored, as Gothic Art was ignored a hundred years ago. But there are already signs of change; and the place of Indian art in the collective culture of humanity a hundred years hence is not less assured than that of Gothic Art to-day.

Two special causes have, together with defective education in modern times, contributed to the neglect of Indian art; first, the entirely scientific and archaeological approach, and second, the concentration of attention upon the artistically unimportant work of the Gandhara School. We have only to turn over the pages of such a work as Grunwedel's Buddhist Art in India to realise how completely these two obsessions have obscured the consideration of the significance of Indian art, as art.

The Gandhara sculptures are probably the work of late Greco-Roman craftsmen striving in vain to interpret Indian ideals. Their work constitutes perhaps the least important chapter in the history of Indian art. The whole question of Greek influence has been misapprehended. "The zenith of Greek art was in the fifth century B. C.; of Indian, certainly not before the fourth century A. D. Mr. Vincent Smith's statement, in the new edition of the Imperial Gazetteer of India, that Indian sculpture after 300 A. D. hardly deserves the name of art, will not be endorsed by artists. As a matter of fact, it was not until the direct effects of decadent classic influence had passed away that the Indian genius was able to assert itself." The matter depends fundamentally upon religious considerations. The philosophies of Greek and Indian art are poles apart. Greece could not have given to India what is greatest and most essential in her art. In comparison with this fact, the possible borrowing of particular conventions is of the smallest significance; and even here it would be hard to disprove the alternative theory of a common source.

Greek art was the perfect expression of a cult of physical human beauty; Indian art did not despise beauty, of which it had its own ideal, but beauty was not its only aim. Its aim was manifestation; manifestation of a reality beyond the limited conceptions of beauty and ugliness. The Greek portrayed humanity; the Indian, God. Greek art is admittedly in no sense transcendental or mystic; Indian art aimed ever at the intuition of the Infinite Unknown. Without making any comparison of Greek with Indian art in respect of greatness of aim or achievement, it is clear from such considerations that the one could not have been the other.

Theoretical and serious study of Indian art is hardly yet begun; the place of art in the national ideal is not realised. Ravi Varma's theatrical and, in the artistic sense of the word, vulgar, paintings are still accepted as a wonderful achievement; the Silpa Sastras lie untouched, the men that used them have forgotten what they mean; the paintings of Tagore are better appreciated in England than in India. Every year the German collector and the American tourist are taking away from India the perfect work of bygone craftsmen, to place in their Museums for the instruction of their own designers, or to set about their drawing rooms as 'ornaments'; every year, too, they are hastening the degeneration of the craftsmen by buying the cheap worthless modern work, which is the result of the craftsmen's discovery that anything is good enough for the ordinary tourist. Every year educated Indians, rich Zemindars and Rajas, spend more on foreign luxuries, and less on the true art that may be found beside their very gates. Shall it be said of us, as it has been said lately by a sympathetic student of Egyptian Nationalism, that our Nationalism too is active as yet only in the realm of pure politics. It is doing nothing to create a native literature, or even to stimulate historical studies. Buried for ever with diplomatic and constitutional questions, the young men who have formed themselves on its teaching are leading an intellectual life as narrow as it is keen. The idea of nationality opens for them no new doors in the world of thought. They do not love the past. They do not seek to find a compensation for political impotence in artistic creation.

I should rather put the last statement in this way that in the world of art there has as yet appeared no sign of life corresponding to the vitality of political ideas.*

For, artistic creation is certainly not to be regarded as a 'compensation for political impotence'; much rather should artistic creation and the struggle for political freedom be equal and complementary evidence of the vitality of the national idealism.

* The new school of national art led by Abanindranath Tagore and his pupils is so far the only—though a very important exception to this general statement.

PAPER-MAKING IN INDIA FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES DOWNWARDS

I

All Historical Account of Paper- Making in India

In ancient times various materials were employed in India for writing. Stones, bricks, wooden boards, chips of bamboo, metal plates (especially those of copper), and above all, palm-leaves and birch-bark, burja (Baetula bhojpattria) were all in use. The last is even called lekhanā or "the writing material," and written documents go by the name of Bhurja. The art of preparing the bark for use has now been lost. But birch-bark manuscripts are said to be still common in the libraries of the Kashmir pandits. They are, however, very rare in the Khatmunda Library in Nepal, where most of the ancient manuscripts are found written on palm-leaves.

Skins of animals so common in other countries were not much in vogue in India, probably on account of their being ritually impure. Alburini, who visited India with Mahmud of Ghazni and gave a detailed account of the manners and customs, science and literature art and industries of the people of this country, expressly says, "The Hindus are not in the habit of writing on hides like the Greeks in ancient times." A reference to this practice is implied in the reply given by Socrates when he was questioned as to why he did not compose book: "I don't transfer knowledge," said he, "from the living hearts of men to the dead hides of sheep."

The use of well-beaten cotton cloth as a writing material by the Hindus is mentioned by Nearchus who was one of the generals of Alexander the Great. The Kanarese traders still use for their books of business a kind of cloth, called kadatam, which is covered with a paste of tamarind seed afterwards blackened with charcoal. The letters are written with chalk of steatite pencils, and the writing is white on black (Mysore or Croog Gazetteer, 1877, 1, 408).

The first authentic account of paper-making in India dates from the times of the Emperor Akbar, when the art is said to have been introduced into Kashmir. It spread rapidly all over India and displaced the birch-bark and palm-leaves that were previously used for writing. The Persian word for paper, kagaj, has been adopted in most Indian languages. This also points to the Mahomedan introduction of the industry. The Sanskrit word for that which is used for writing upon is patra, the same as pata in Bengali.

It is probable, however, that the art of paper-making came from China to the inhabitants of Eastern Himalaya long anterior to the introduction of the paper industry into Kashmir by Akbar. Rajendra Lala Mitra asserts that a "letter-writer by king Bhoja of Dhara proves its use in Malwa during the 11th century A. D. (Gough's papers, 16). This king it may be mentioned, reigned from 1106 to 1142 (?) and was one of the Hindu chiefs who fought Mahmud of Ghazni. At any rate paper had not yet become common in India, unlike in Mahomedan countries, at this time.

Paper manuscripts dated Vicrama Samvat 1384 and 1394 (A. D. 1327-28 and 1337-38), the leaves of which are cut according to the size of palm-leaves, have been discovered by Peterson at Anhilvad Patan. It is very doubtful if any of the ancient manuscripts from Khaxgar which are written on a peculiar paper, covered with a layer of gypsum are of Indian origin: Dr. Hoernle believes that all of them were written in Central Asia.

II

Nepal Paper.

During his recent visit to Khatmunda Pandit Haraprasad Shastri acquired a Sanskrit manuscript belonging to the 11th century A. D. written on Nepal paper.

It may be interesting to mention that paper is made in Nepal partly from bamboo and partly from the bark of a small thorny shrub known as Mahabeva's flower (Daphne cannabina). The surface is made glossy by rubbing with a smooth piece of stone. The Daphne paper is generally very thick and is made thicker and stiffer by being coated over with a paste made from the boiled kernel of tamarind seed. It is coloured yellow on the side, probably with turmeric. Thus prepared the paper becomes very hard and looks almost like a piece of hide. But the use of the paste from the tamarind seed makes the paper unfit for the transcription of sacred texts. As we shall see later on, in Bengal and perhaps elsewhere in India, a solution of starch made by boiling sunned rice is used for sizing paper. This operation is called 'tulat'. Paper which was subjected to this process was avoided by the old pandits for writing their 'pothis'.

Excepting in the case of correspondence with the outside world, the Nepal Government never uses any machine-made foreign paper.

The Daphne paper, though commonly known as Nepal paper, is really mostly made in Bhutan. But the Bhutias also use the bark of another plant locally known as 'Diah' for paper making. The process followed is just the same as in China and Japan.

Present Condition of the Hand-made Paper Industry

BENGAL.

Paper-making is a dying industry in the province of Bengal. Only a generation ago it was still in a flourishing condition. Within this short period it has completely disappeared from many districts. At present the industry, such as it is, exists only in three districts in Bengal: in Hooghly, Howrah and Murshidabad. In Howrah the industry is confined to a single village named Mainah, three miles from Amta Railway Station in the Ulubaria Sub-Division. In Murshidabad it is confined to two villages named Kristapur and Srirampur, in thana Samserganj in the Jansipur Sub-division. In the Hooghly district it is made at Manad and Gossainmalpara in the Polba police-station, at Neala in the Pandua police-station, at Shahbazar and other villages in the Dhanialkhal police-station and at Bali Dewanganj in the Arambagh Sub-division.

It is in the hands of a class of Muhammadans known as Kagjis or paper-makers. The sight of a Kagji village is most melancholy. So far as the paper industry goes the crude hand tools in use in this country have apparently no chance whatever against machinery. At Mainah near Amata in the Ulubaria Sub-division, Howrah district, out of 100 families that carried on the industry 30 or 35 years ago, only half-a-dozen families still desperately stick to their old profession, the rest having either turned cultivators or labourers or having left the village. The Kagji villages in the Hooghly district are, if possible, only in a worse plight, having been devastated by malaria in addition to the havoc caused by the competition of machine-made paper. Paper-making used to be carried on at Nasirganj in the Shahabad district, but the industry ceased to exist some years ago. The Collector of Cuttack reports that about 30 years ago a small paper-making industry was carried on by some Muhammadans of Hariharpur. There are still 7 men who can make paper but the industry is dead. The paper was made from straw and though rough and coarse was formerly used in the Collectorate Record-room for fly-leaves, but its use has been discontinued for some years.

At Shahbazar near Tarakeswar (district Hooghly) in place of 'dhenkis' (as the mortar-and-pestle arrangement for producing the pulp is called) only two are still in use. The large pieces of stone that once served as mortars for the 'dhenkis' lie scattered about, sometimes serving only as steps for their houses. The people sorrowfully point to the large tanks their forefathers had excavated from the profits of paper and which have now become silted up containing only a little dirty water.

THE UNITED PROVINCES.

An idea of the present condition of the industry in the United Provinces may be obtained from the following extracts from "Notes on the Industries of the United Provinces" by Mr. A. C. Chatterjee, I.C.S., who was deputed by the Government of these provinces to enquire into the condition of the local industries and possibilities of their development. Says Mr. Chatterjee (pp. 82-83) "At one time an extensive hand industry in paper flourished in these provinces. Mathura (Muttra), Lucknow, Jaunpur, and Kara in the Allahabad district were the principal centres. The process of manufacturing the coarser kinds was described at pages 127 and 128 of Dr. Hoey's Monograph on the Trades and Manufactures of Northern India. The industry is now practically extinct in the three last-named places. Some paper is manufactured by hand in the interior of the Almora district from the fibre of the boru plant, but I have had no opportunity of seeing the process. In the town of Muttra (Mathura) the hand industry still manages to survive."

FACTS AND COMMENTS.

The Cretan Difficulty.

Foreign affairs are as a rule lightly and unsubstantially dealt with by Indian journals. This is partly due to want of the necessary information, partly to the parochial habit of mind encouraged by a cabined and subject national life which cannot enlarge its imagination outside the sphere of those immediate and daily events directly touching ourselves. And yet the happenings of today in Asia, Europe and Africa are of great moment to the future of India and full of encouragement and stimulus to the spirit of Nationalism. The recent events in Turkey are an instance. It is not the methods of the Young Turks which have any lesson for India. The circumstances are too dissimilar to warrant any fanciful theories of that kind. It is rather the character of the party of freedom which bears a lesson to all struggling nationalities. The dominant qualities of the democratic leaders—and these are the qualities they have imported to the movement,—are strength, manhood, a bold heart, a clear brain, a virile efficiency. The Government they have established has begun showing these qualities to the full in its treatment of the Cretan difficulty. It has shown that free Turkey, while not really children of the circumstances created by an unfortunate past, will not tolerate any attempt to be treated as Sultan Abdul Hamid suffered himself to be treated. Sultan Abdul Hamid, afraid of his subjects, afraid of the world, afraid even of his spies and informers, followed the weak and cowardly policy of a dishonest, intriguing and evasive Machiavellianism. He conducted that policy with a certain skill and statecraft in details which eventually evoked admiration, but it could neither save Turkey from ignominy and weakness nor permanently protect a throne based upon cruelty, falsehood and despicable meanness. All that it did, for Satan must be given his due, was to stave off a final disruption of Turkey and expulsion of the Ottoman from Europe. But true freedom is always conscious of strength and knows that it is better to perish than to live for a short while longer at the cost of continual insult, degradation and weakness. The first efforts of the new Government have been to save what remained of the outskirts of Turkish empire in Europe, the suzerainty in Crete, the supreme control in Macedonia. Their diplomacy has been strong, outspoken and fearless. It did not flinch nor in any way draw back a step or lower its tone until it forced Greece to a satisfactory attitude and obliged the Powers to battle the tortuous Greek methods by lowering the Greek flag in Canea. It has quietly ignored the attempt of the Powers to interfere even by a suggestion in the direct question between itself and Greece; for we read that Turkey is not going to give any formal answer to the Powers' Note recommending pacific counsels as that Note did not call for any reply. It has been supported by the newly liberated nation by means of a Boycott which would have alarmed into reason a stronger Government than that of Athens. And as strength; when firm and able, can never be ignored, it has secured the sympathy of the Powers in the shape of concessions which would never have been yielded to a weak or over-cautious Government. Strength attracts strength; firm and clear-minded courage commands success and respect; strong and straight dealing can dispense with the methods of dissimulation and intrigue. All these are signs of character and it is only character that can give freedom and greatness to nations. Greece and Turkey.

It is not to be imagined however, that this is the closing chapter. The question between Greece and Turkey will have eventually to be fought out by the sword. It is true that the immediate question is for the moment settled and the rest in the Cretan patchwork mended. But that patchwork is not of a kind to last. The Greek Government is not likely to give up its methods in Crete, the Christian population their desire for union with Athens or the present Cretan administration their secret sympathy with and support of these aspirations. It would have been a simpler matter if the population of the island had been wholly Christian, but there is a Mahomedan population also which is as eagerly attached to the Turkish connection as the others are desirous of the Greek. The ancient history of Crete supports the sentiment of Greek unity, its later history the sentiment of imperial Ottoman greatness. And apart from Crete, there are inevitable sources of quarrel in Macedonia. Some day the Powers will have to stand aside and allow these natural enemies to settle the question in the only possible way. The result of such non-intervention in an armed struggle could not be doubtful. The Mongolian is a stronger spirit than the Slav, the Mussulman a greater dynamic force than the Christian, and it is only ignorance and absolutism that has for the time depressed the Turk. The disparity between the Turk and the Greek is abysmal. The former is a soldier and statesman, the latter a merchant and intriguer. A war between two such Powers with none to intervene would speedily end with the Turk not only in occupation of Thessaly but entering Athens.

Spain and the Moor.

Another corner of the Asiatic world—for Northern Africa is thoroughly Asianised if not Asiatic,—is convulsed with struggles which may well precede another resurgence. There was a time when the Moor held Spain and gave civilisation to semi-barbarous Europe. The revolution of the wheel has now gone to its utmost length and finds the Spaniard invading Morocco. But this invasion does not seem to promise any Spanish expansion in Africa. With infinite difficulty and at the cost of a bloody eunuch in Spain King Alfonso's Government have landed a considerable army in Morocco and yet with all that force can only just protect their communications and are still facing the formidable country where the stubborn Kabyle tribesmen await the invader. There the army is hung up for the present, unwilling to retreat and afraid to advance, and the Spanish General has again sent to Spain for reinforcements, a feat of military strategy at which he seems to be exceptionally skilful. If the men of the mountains are fortunate enough to have a leader with a head on his shoulders, the circumstances augur a reverse for Spain as decisive and perhaps more sanguinary than the Italian overthrow in Abyssinia. Meanwhile King Alfonso has sacrificed all his youthful popularity by this ill-omened war and the bloody severity which has temporarily saved his throne. And with the popularity of the young King has gone the friendship of the Spanish nation for England, for the Spaniards accuse that friendship of the origination of these troubles and the British Government as the selfish instigators of the intervention in Morocco.

The London Congress.

Since we made our remarks on the proposal of a Congress session in London, we have seen two reasons urged for this reactionary step. It is necessary, it seems, to prevent judgment going against us in England by default and also to win the sympathy of the civilised world. The former argument we have already answered in our last issue. Neither the speeches of a famous orator nor the conjoint speeches of many less famous will win for us the support of the British people for claims which go directly against their interests. Only a prolonged and steady campaign in England all the year round for several years can make any impression of a real and lasting kind and even that impression cannot in the nature of things be sufficient for the purpose. Those who are on the side of Indian interests must always be in the minority and will always be denounced by the majority as allies of the enemies of English interests. Even now that is increasingly the attitude of the public towards Mr Mackarness and his supporters and we do not think Sir Surendranath's eloquence has changed matters. Already the most prominent critics of Lord Morley and his policy of repression have received intimation from their constituents of their serious displeasure and are in danger of losing their seats at the next election. This is in itself a sufficient refutation of the fable that speeches and Congresses in England can change an ignorant British public into informed and enthusiastic supporters of Indian self-government. It is only political necessity and the practical recognition that change is inevitable which can convert the statesmen of England. As for the opinion of the civilised world, we do not despise it as a moral force. But its practical effect is so little as to be almost nil. In a constitutional question between the present Government in India and the people we do not see what can be the place or mode of operation of the world's opinion or sympathy. An academical approval of our aims can be of no help to us. Nor is the sympathy of the world likely to be excited beyond such academical approval unless the Government faithfully imitates the Russian precedent in dealing with popular aspirations. Even then it is not likely to tell on the action of the Government concerned which will certainly resent foreign interference in its dealings with its own subjects. The impotence of the civilised world was strikingly shown in the crisis of Russian despotism and at the time of the Boer war. Even were it otherwise, a London session of the Congress would only awaken a passing interest. In that respect the visit of Swami Vivekananda to America and the subsequent work of those who followed him did more for India than a hundred London Congresses could effect. That is the true way of awaking sympathy,—by showing ourselves to the nations as a people with a great past and ancient civilisation who still possess something of the genius and character of our forefathers, have still something to give the world and therefore deserve freedom,—by proof of our manliness and fitness, not by mendicancy.

Political Prisoners.

We extract elsewhere some very telling criticisms from the pen of the well-known positivist Mr. Frederic Harrison on the treatment of political prisoners. This is a subject on which a Nationalist writer is naturally somewhat shy of dilating, as any stress on the brutality and callousness of the treatment to which not only convicted but undetected prisoners of gentle birth and breeding are sometimes subjected in Indian jails, might be misinterpreted by our opponents as an unwillingness to face the possibility on those who cherish great aspirations for their race and country. But two instances have occurred recently which compel attention. One is the death of the convicted prisoner Ashok Nandi of consumption brought on by exposure and neglect during fever in the undertrial period of the Alipur Case. We exonerate from blame the jail authorities who were exceptionally humane men and would have been glad to deal humanely with the prisoners. But their blamelessness only brings out the barbarity of a system which allows of the confinement of a delicate ailing lad in a punishment cell exposed night after night to the dews and cold of an unhealthy season, and that without his having committed any fault or shown anything but the mildest and most docile of characters. The other case is that of Mr. Achyut Rao Kohlatkar of Nagpur, editor of the Doshsevak, a gentleman of distinguished education, ability and character, who was convicted for the publication in his paper of the reports of Sri Aurobindo Ghose's speeches delivered at a time when Mr. Kohlatkar was absent from Nagpur. The Sessions Judge of Alipur declared on the police reports of these speeches that so far from being seditious or violent they told in favour of the speaker and not against him. We find it difficult to believe that the newspaper report of speeches from which the police could extract nothing that was not in the speaker's favour, could be at all seditious. Be that as it may, Mr. Kohlatkar was convicted and perhaps, according to the "strong man" code of ethics, forfeited claim to generous treatment by his refusal to apologise. We have heard rumours of treatment being mooted out to him which can only be described as studied brutality and the evidence of eye-witnesses who have seen the condition to which he was reduced, do not encourage us to reject these reports as fabrications. Finally, the refusal of the Central Provinces Government to face independent medical inspection and so dispose of the serious allegations publicly preferred put a very ugly aspect on this case. If the allegations are true, they amount to a treatment which would evoke the loudest indignation and reprobation in England if applied under the same circumstances in another country. But we cherish little hope of redress. The prison system of the European nations is only a refined and systematized savagery perpetuating the methods of ancient and mediaeval barbarity in forms that do not at once shock the eye. Besides, the account of the recent starvation strike of the Suffragettes has shown what callous and brutal treatment can be inflicted by English officials in England itself even on women, and women of education, good birth, position and culture, guilty only of political obstruction and disorderliness. Yet this is the civilisation for which we are asked to sacrifice the inheritance of our forefathers!

An Official Freak

We suppose in a bureaucracy it is inevitable that officials should be masters and be able to inflict inconvenience and loss on the citizen without any means of redress. Last Monday the publication of a new weekly named Dharma, edited by Aurobindo Ghose, was due and had been widely announced. The issue was ready and the printer duly attended the Police Court to declare his responsibility for printing and publishing the periodical. Except under very unusual circumstances this is a mere formality and one would have thought no difficulty could intervene, but nothing could persuade the Court Official to refrain from delaying the acceptance till the next day. It was pointed out that this would entail unnecessary inconvenience and perhaps considerable financial loss, but that naturally did not concern him as he was the master of the public and not their servant. The next day a variation of the same vexatious procedure was repeated. It was whispered, we do not know with what truth, that the first delay was for the Criminal Investigation Department to have time to find out whether the printer had been convicted in any sedition case. If so it was a futile delay. There is no concealment of the responsibility with regard to this paper. The name of the editor and proprietor was openly given and the printer was there to accept his responsibility. This does not look like intended sedition. If there were any doubt the required information could easily have been gained from the Manager of the paper who was present and would no doubt have been glad to save delay and loss by stating the printer's antecedents. It was not likely that he would conceal a conviction as that would be breathing impossible to suppress. But then, if officials were to acquire a common sense, the laws of Nature would be sadly contravened and it is better to inflict loss on individuals than to upset a law of Nature.

Soham Gita.

Every Bengalee is familiar with the name or Shyamakanta Banerji the famous athlete and tigertamer but it may not be known to all that after leaving the worldly life and turning to the life of the ascetic, this pioneer of the cult of physical strength and courage in Bengal has taken the name of Soham Swami and is dwelling in a hermitage in the Himalayas at Nainital. The Swami has now published a philosophical poem in his mother tongue called the Soham Gita. The deep truths of the Vedanta viewed from the standpoint of the Advaitavadin and the spiritual experiences of the Jnani who has had realisation of dhyana and samadhi are here developed in simple verse and language. We shall deal with the work in a more detailed review in a later issue.

BENGAL AND THE CONGRESS.

The dissensions in the Congress have been a severe test of the capacity of the Indian people to act politically under modern conditions. The first necessary element of democratic politics is difference of opinion; robust, frank, avowed, firmly and passionately held, and the first test of political capacity in a democratic nation is to bear these differences of opinion, however strong and even vehement, without disruption. In a monarchy differences of opinion are either stifled by an all-powerful absolute will or subordinated and kept in check by the supreme kingly arbiter; in an aristocracy the jealousy of a close body discourages free opinion and its free expression; in a bureaucracy stereotyped habits of action and method lead to a fixed and inflexible way.

thinking and difference of opinion, when tolerated, is kept by the exigencies of administration private and largely ineffective. It is democracy alone that demands free divergence of opinion in politics and open propagandism and debate as the very breath of its nostrils. The tendency to democracy creates freedom of speech and thought and these in their turn hasten the advent of democracy. All attempts to silence by force or evasion important differences of opinion are anti-democratic and though they do not necessarily show an incapacity for government, do show an incapacity for democratic politics. The democratic tendency in humanity is and has long been pressing forward victoriously to self-fulfilment and the modern attempt of the banded forces of autocracy, bureaucracy, plutocracy and theocracy to turn its march can only result in its growing stronger by the check and urging forward with greater impetuosity to its goal. It is therefore the democratic tendency and the democratic capacity which must be accepted and shown by any nation which aspires to go forward and be among the leaders of the world. In the matter of the Congress it is only Bengal, so far, that has shown the democratic capacity of being able to meet and discuss and to a certain extent work together in spite of grave and even fundamental differences. To a large extent this is due to the fact that all parties in Bengal have some common ground. Just as the different parties in a well-organised country, even when they differ in everything else, have this foundation of union and common tolerance that all are desirous of the freedom, greatness and sound internal condition and development of their nation, so we in Bengal are all agreed in holding the development of a well-organised, self-sufficient and self-governing people as the immediate and ultimate object of all our politics. This is only to say that Bengal has attained earlier than other provinces to political perception and sound political instincts. There are forces of disruption in Bengal as everywhere else; but it says much for the capacity and insight of the mass of the educated class that these forces have been overborne and Bengal preserves her unity. The credit is due much more to the people themselves than to the leaders on either side, and this itself is the healthiest sign of all and the guarantee of democratic development. When the people are wiser than their leaders and wise men, the democratic future of a country is assured. Men of great gifts and strong character are often carried away by their eager perceptions and at such moments it is the sound common sense of a capable democracy that sets right the balance. It was this common sense that saved the situation after Surat. The people had the instinct to desire unity and the good sense to see that unity was not possible or, if possible, was not worth having by the sacrifice of the movement which Bengal had initiated. That such an unthinkable repudiation would have been the first result of surrender to the Convention leaders of Bombay and Madras, has been sufficiently proved by the determined rejection of the Boycott resolution at the meeting of the Convention last December. The Pabna resolution for an United Congress was therefore so framed as to leave the Convention Committee a door open for reconciliation. They rejected the opportunity on a constitutional technicality of a purely verbal character and of doubtful validity and proceeded to show the honesty of this sudden passion for scrupulous constitutional procedure when they imposed a constitution on the body they chose to call the Congress without allowing it to be submitted for acceptance or amendment by that body. The resolution at Hughly ought to be differently framed so as not only to make an United Congress possible but to bring it about so far as Bengal can help towards that consummation.

In Bengal there are three classes of opinion as to the best way of meeting the difficulty. There is a small section of the Moderate party which desires the Convention Congress to stand and the Nationalists to be excluded. There are two courses open to this minority. They may insist on the Bengal Provincial Conference and the District Committees accepting the body created by the Congress Committee as the real Congress and on their loyally following the rules and the instructions of this Congress and its provincial Committee. If that were accepted the Bengal Provincial Conference would become a Moderate organisation and, while commercial Swadeshi would be preserved, the Boycott would disappear from the avowed programme of Bengal. But we do not think anyone will have the hardihood to make this proposal in so many terms and if any ventured so far, it would be without any chance of popular acceptance. A more probable course is for this minority to agree to a vague and easily evaded resolution which they will have no intention of accepting as a guide to conduct and to oppose the passing of any more definite resolution on the ground that Bengal ought to preserve its own integrity and leave the rest of India to its divisions. The object they would aim at is to leave the Convention and its Committees to figure as the real Congress and Congress Committees and themselves be free to join them without popular disapproval. But the inevitable consequence would be that the Nationalists will be compelled to erect another body which would represent their interests. The erection of a rival National Congress at Nagpur last year was prevented by the Government, fortunately, we think, for no such body could really claim to be a National Assembly any more than the Convention can justly claim that character. But if an United Congress proves impossible, the Nationalists cannot allow the Convention unchallenged to delude the world by pretending to voice authoritatively the sense of the Indian nation.

A second section of opinion is that of advanced Moderates and among these we find two ways of thinking. Some lay stress on the unconstitutional conduct of the Convention Committee in forcing their constitution on the Madras Convention without submitting it to discussion and seem to think that by passing it through the next sitting the constitutional defect will be cured. They seem to forget that it will be a Congress elected under this unconstitutional constitution to which the question will be submitted. In effect, therefore, a body unconstitutionally elected will be validated the unlawful law under which it was born and so cure its own unconstitutional character with-and incurable defect which prevents it from sitting at all. The constitutional difficulty will not be met and the political difficulty will remain as serious as ever, for the Nationalists would still be excluded and the menace to our unity in Bengal would increase every year. Others of the advanced Moderates see more clearly and can understand that only a freely-elected Congress, as freely elected as the Highly Conference will be, can accept this constitution or form any other. Any resolution passed on this subject must therefore contemplate a freely elected session and the submission to it of any constitution proposed or drafted for the better organisation of Congress procedure and Congress affairs.

The third section of opinion is that of the Nationalist party. Immediately after the fracas at Surat, on the same day indeed, the party became acutely sensible of the nature of the catastrophe which had occurred and its first step was to take an attitude which might leave the way open to reconciliation; and this attitude they maintained at all the subsequent Conferences where they were either represented or dominant. We do not agree with Lala Lajpatrai's suggestion that the Congress should always remain in the hands of the Moderates; a popular body must remain either in the hands of the party which numerically predominates or be run by a joint body representing them proportionately to their numbers. But the Nationalists would not deny the name of Congress to a body merely because its administration was in the hands of a single party. They refuse it because that body by a constitution passed without right or authority excludes a powerful section of opinion in the country and pretends to be a National Congress when it is really a party organisation. If the Convention were to consent to a free election and a free constitution, the Nationalist party would not allow a matter of nomenclature, however important, to stand in the way of reunion. But the Convention constitution is not free. It is in the first place a close oligarchical constitution seeking to limit the right of election to a few privileged bodies affiliated to itself. Even if this reactionary limitation were to be confirmed by a freely elected Congress the Nationalists would have no cause of complaint, for they would still be free to organise a party institution which would spread the knowledge and appreciation of democratic principles and get these limitations abrogated from within the Congress itself. But the Constitution is also not free in virtue of the eligibility to delegateship being limited to those who can sign a declaration of faith specially designed to exclude the advanced school of patriotism. This limitation is vital. A national Assembly cannot bind itself by any creed but the creed of patriotism which is understood and which it would be futile to express. The Nationalist party cannot accept the limitation of delegateship by an exclusive creed. They would not seek to bind it by their own creed, still less can they accept a creed which contravenes their avowed principles. The Congress may always pass a resolution expressing its aims and objects. That is merely the opinion of the majority and can always be changed if the minority becomes the majority. But a personal subscription to views one does not hold is unthinkable to any man of honour and probity. These are the three parties and their views. The election of a free Congress is the only possible way to their final reconciliation, the omission of the creed the only condition of the continuance of an United Congress. It is for the good sense of the people at large to decide between these conflicting views and determine what is best for Bengal and the nation.

PART II

Chapter Three

1. Yama said. "This is the eternal uswattha-tree whose roots are aloft, but its branches are downward. It is He that is called the Bright One and Brahman and Immortality, and in Him are all the worlds established; none goeth beyond Him. This is the thing thou seekest.

2. All this universe of motion moveth in the Prana and from the Prana also it proceeded; a mighty terror is He, yea, a thunderbolt upheld, that He is the Immortal.

3. For fear of Him the fire burneth, for fear of Him the sun giveth light, for fear of Him Indra and Vajras and Death hasten in their courses.

4. If in this world of men and before thy body fall from thee, thou art able to apprehend it, then thou art able for embodiment in the worlds that are His creations.

5. In the self one seeth God as in a mirror but as in a dream in the world of the fathers, and as in water one seeth the surface of an object, so one seeth Him in the world of the Gandharvas; but He is seen as light and shade in the heaven of the Spirit.

6. The calm soul having comprehended the separateness of the senses and the rising of them and their setting and their separate emergence putteth from him pain and sorrow.

7. The mind is higher than the senses, and above the mind is the thought, and above the thought is the mighty Spirit, and above the Mighty One is the Unmanifest.

8. But highest above the Unmanifest is the Purusha who pervadeth all and alone hath no sign nor feature. Mortal man knowing Him is released into immortality.

9. He hath not set His body within the ken of seeing neither doth any man with the eye behold Him, but to the heart and mind and the supermind He is manifest. Who know Him are the immortals.

10. When the five senses cease and are at rest and the mind resteth with them and the Thought ceaseth from its workings, that is the highest state, say thinkers.

11. Not with the mind hath man the power to see God, no, nor by speech nor with the eye. Unless one saith "He is," how can one become sensible of Him.

12. One must apprehend Him in the concept "He is" and also in His essential principle, but when he hath grasped Him as the Is, then the essential of Him dawneth upon a man.

13. When every desire that harboureth in the heart of a man hath been loosened from its moorings, then this mortal putteth on immortality; even here he enjoyeth Brahman in this human body.

14. "When all the strings of the heart are rent asunder, even here in this human birth, then the mortal becometh immortal. This is the whole teaching of the Scriptures."

15. A hundred and one are the nerves of the heart and of all these only one issueth out through the head of a man; by this the soul mounteth up to its immortal home but the rest lead him to all sorts and conditions of births in his passing.

16. The Purusha, the Spirit within, who is no larger than the finger of a man is seated for ever in the heart of creatures; one must separate Him with patience from one's own body as one separates from a blade of grass its main fibre. Thou shalt know Him for the Bright and the Immortal, yea, for the Bright Immortal."

17. Thus did Nachicatus with Death for his teacher win the God-knowledge; he learned likewise the whole ordinance of the Yoga: thereafter he obtained Brahman and became void of stain and void of death. So shall another be who cometh likewise to the science of the Spirit.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER II.

Mohendra departed. Left alone with no one near her but a little girl, Kalyani in that solitary and unpeopled place, in that almost pitch-dark cottage began to study closely every side. Great fear was upon her. No one anywhere, no sound of human existence to be heard, only the howling of the dogs and the jackals. She regretted letting her husband go,—hunger and thirst might after all have been borne a little longer. She thought of shutting all the doors and sitting in the security of the closed house. But not a single door had either panel or bolt. As she was thus gazing in every direction suddenly something in the doorway that faced her caught her eye, something like a shadow. It seemed to her to have the shape of a man and yet not to be human. Something utterly dried up and withered, something like a very black, a naked and terrifying human shape had come and was standing at the door. After a little while the shadow seemed to lift a hand,—with the long withered finger of a long withered hand all skin and bone it seemed to make a motion of summons to some one outside. Kalyani's heart dried up in her with fear. Then just such another shadow, withered, black, tall, naked, came and stood by the side of the first. Then another came and yet another came. Many came, —slowly, noiselessly they began to enter the room. The room with its almost blind darkness grew dreadful as a midnight burning-ground. All those corpse-like figures gathered round Kalyani and her daughter. Kalyani almost swooned away. Then the black withered men seized and lifted up the woman and the girl, carried them out of the house and entered into a jungle across the open fields.

A few minutes afterwards Mohendra arrived with the milk in the waterjar. He found the whole place empty. Hither and thither he searched, often called aloud his daughter's name and at last even his wife's. There was no answer, he could find no trace of his wife and child.

CHAPTER THIRD.

It was a very beautiful woodland in which the robbers set down Kalyani. There was no light, no eye to see the loveliness,—the beauty of the wood remained invisible like the beauty of soul in a poor man's heart. There might be no food in the country, but there was wealth of flowers in the woodland; so thick was the fragrance that even in that darkness one seemed to be conscious of a light. On a clear spot in the middle covered with soft grass the thieves set down Kalyani and her child and themselves sat around them. Then they began to debate what to do with them, for what ornaments Kalyani had with her were already in their possession. One group were very busy with the division of this booty. But when the ornaments had been divided, one of the robbers said, "What are we to do with gold and silver? Someone give me a handful of rice in exchange for an ornament; I am tortured with hunger, I have eaten today nothing but the leaves of trees." No sooner had one so spoken than all echoed him and a clamour arose. "Give us rice, give us rice, we do not want gold and silver." The leader tried to quiet them, but no one listened to him. Gradually high words began to be exchanged, abuse flowed freely, a fight became imminent. Every one in a rage pelted the leader with his whole allotment of ornaments. He also struck one or two and this brought all of them upon him striking at him in a general assault. The robber captain was emaciated and ill with starvation, one or two blows laid him prostrate and lifeless. Then one in that hungry wrathful, excited, maddened troop of plunderers cried out, "We have eaten the flesh of dogs and jackals and now we are racked with hunger; come, friends, let us feast to-day on this rascal." Then all began to shout aloud "Glory to Kali! Bom Kali! to-day we will eat human flesh." And with this cry those black emaciated corpse-like figures began to shout with laughter and dance and clap their hands in the congenial darkness. One of them set about lighting a fire to roast the body of the leader. He gathered dried creepers, wood and grass, struck flint and iron and set light to the collected fuel. As the fire burned up a little, the dark green foliage of the trees that were neighbours to the spot, mango, lemon, jackfruit and palm, tamarind and date, were lit up faintly with the flames. Here the leaves seemed ablaze, there the grass brightened in the light; in some places the darkness only became more crass and deep. When the fire was ready, one began to drag the corpse by the leg and was about to throw it on the fire, but another intervened and said "Drop it! stop, stop! if it is on the grand meat that we must keep ourselves alive to-day, then why the tough and juiceless flesh of this old fellow? We shall eat what we have looted and brought with us today. Come along, there is that tender girl, let us roast and eat her." Another said "Roast anything you like, my good fellow, but roast it; I can stand this hunger no longer." Then all gazed greedily towards the place where Kalyani and her daughter had lain. They saw the place empty; neither child nor mother was there. Kalyani had seen her opportunity when the robbers were disputing, taken her daughter into her arms, put the child's mouth to her breast and fled into the wood. Aware of the escape of their prey, the ghostlike ruffian crew ran in every direction with a cry of "Kill, kill". In certain conditions man is no better than a ferocious wild beast.

AN APPEAL FOR THE RAM KRISHNA MISSION HOME OF SERVICE, BENARES.

MY COUNTRYMEN IN LOVE AND CHARITY.—

I beg on behalf of the Ramkrishna Mission Home of Service to appeal to you for assistance both in money and materials. The Home was started some ten years ago here by a band of enthusiastic young men with the objects of succouring the destitutes and the sick of any race and creed and reaching help particularly to those who could not be relieved by the usual channels. Under the grace of God it has steadily developed and has had recently the honor of repeated visits by the Commissioner and Collector of Benares both of whom expressed their perfect approval of the aims and admiration at the methods (involving great labour and self sacrifice on the part of the noble honorary workers—the mainstay of the Home) employed for their realisation. An influential Raja of Benares has by his large hearted charity enabled permanent quarters and hospital to be erected for the use of the Home. The building is however still incomplete and it is estimated another Rs 10000 will be necessary before it could perform all its purpose. The endowing of beds, a few of which has already been so done, is another matter which I beg earnestly to commend to the notice of all generous and charitable people. Above all the work i. e. the amount of help solicited, has gone on increasing every year and therefore a steady corresponding growth in income too has become necessary—unless we are to close our doors to the needy and diseased and I am sure the generous public will not allow it to come to such a pass.

The work is essentially one of service to humanity and as such I appeal to you, of whatever creed or colour, race or nationality for the help that in all religion and morality declares that the same divinity is enthroned in every human body, and that to serve suffering humanity is to worship God. The Home needs your kind help however small, for miles thus ever grow to millions.

(AD.) MADHOLALL

President,

R. K. HOME OF SERVICE.

REVOLVERS FOUND.—

A few arrests were made on the night at Asokpur Tazail in the house of Digambar Chakraverti, where it is said the police have secured four revolvers kept ready for use on a table along with materials for preparing cartridges. The District Superintendent of Police with nine constables surrounded the house at midnight and secured the finds. Umasath Das and Amrita Bhattacharjee have also been arrested.

THE "TILAK" SUPPRESSED.—

The Punjab Government "Gazette" says that the Lieutenant-Governor has annulled the declaration in respect thereof under Section 7 of Offences Act.

SRT. BABU ASHWINI KUMAR DUTT.—

Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt, who was put till now at Lucknow, has been removed to Bareilly Jail. His relatives, who were formerly permitted to see him, have been advised accordingly to go to Bareilly.

MR. A. B. KOLHATKAR.—

The following application has been sent on behalf of Mr. Achyut Balwant Kolhatkar, ex-editor of the Deshasevak of Nagpur:—

To The Honourable the Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces and Berar.

Sir,—We beg most respectfully to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 1513 of 13th July, 1900, in reply to our application, dated the 24th June, 1900, regarding the present state of health of Mr. Achyutrao Kolhatkar, B. A., L. L. B., who is undergoing his term of hard labour at present in the District Jail of Khandwa.

In view of the fact that one of us, Er. Cholkar, actually saw the prisoner "in a very bad state of health with sunken eyes and cheeks, very pale anæmic face and in an advanced state of emaciation" with swollen oedematous feet and legs leading him to suppose that this may be due to some form of disease or dangerous cardiac debility, we are extremely sorry to have to bring to your notice that this reply "that we are mistaken in thinking that the prisoner is in bad state of health" has not been able to appease our mind and, we fear, neither that of the public.

We therefore most respectfully beg to request you to order for supplying to us his weights when he was admitted in the Nagpur Jail and also when he was removed to Khandwa Jail.

We shall be much obliged if his present photo be supplied to us or we shall be permitted to take his photo.

We beg to remain,

Sir,

Your most obedient servants,

DHINGRA.—

It was stated a few days ago that the only visitors to Dhingra had been two elderly ladies connected with some Indian Association and an Indian gentleman friend of the condemned man. Dhingra partakes regularly, of his meals, which consist principally of rice and fish. The "Daily Graphic" publishes an extract from a private letter addressed by C. L. Dhingra, the assassin's brother. The writer says that Madan Lal often showed signs of insanity before he left for England. It was thought the stay in England would probably improve his mental weakness. A letter from his brother in England, Bhajan Lal Dhingra to the same effect is published. Bhajan mentioned that he attempted to see his brother in prison twice, but he absolutely declined to see or communicate with him. The Pioneer's London correspondent wires:—A political note in the Times refers to the circulation of what purport to be copies of a statement by Dhingra left in his cell. The Times argues that this was more probably composed by those who egged him on to commit the murder. The document in the cell has been retained by the police, but some copies are stated to have come from Paris. The Evening Standard announces the receipt by Indian students of pamphlets from Paris directly inciting to the emulation of Dhingra's crime. The pamphlet says:—"Even the feeblest Indian youth can arm himself with a revolver and cut asunder at least one link in the iron chain which fetter the mother."

THE LATE BABU ASHUTOSH BISWAS.—

The Secretary of State for India has sanctioned the grant of a Jaighir to the widow and family of the late Babu Ashutosh Biswas, who was murdered at Alipore last February, while engaged as Public Prosecutor in connection with the Alipore Bomb Case. The grant comprises three villages in the district of the 24 Parganas, with a rent-roll of over Rs. 5,000 a year. This property will be held in succession, free of revenue, by the deceased's widow and her eldest son and thereafter half-rates by his grandson.

RAJITPUR DACOITY CASE.—

In the Rajitpur dacoity case, the Government of Eastern Bengal and Assam, under instructions of the Advocate-General has withdrawn the case against Monmohan Barman Roy committed for trial before a special tribunal by Mr. W. L. Scott, Additional Magistrate upon a charge under sections 392, 109 of the Penal Code for want of adequate evidence.

THE "INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST".—

Mr. Krishna Varma's paper, the "Indian Sociologist", has reappeared in England. It is issued by a new printer named Aldred, who states that he is not identified with Krishna Varma's propaganda but that he undertakes the printing in defence of freedom of press.

AN ARREST AT GAUHATI.—

On the 18th August there was considerable stir here on account of the sudden arrest by the police of Profulla Banerjee alias Bibbuti Banerjee, a Bengalee youth, who came here lately and started a swadeshi shop with a small capital. It is said that he could not give a satisfactory account of himself when questioned by the police. He was let out on bail of rupees one hundred by Babu Parkash Chandra Singh, Senior Deputy Magistrate. It was subsequently raised to Rs. 500 by the Deputy Commissioner. Several gentlemen came forward to stand as sureties. No charge is known to have been formulated against him, yet it is believed that the gentleman is respectably connected in Bengal.

MR. VEERENDRA NATH CHATTOPADHYAYA.

A correspondent writes from Hyderabad, Deccan, to a contemporary:—

Mr. Veerendra Nath Chattopadhyaya whose expulsion from the Middle Temple according to Reuter, has been determined on is a Hyderabadee. He is a second child and the eldest son of Dr Aghor Nath Chattopadhyaya, D. Sc (Edin) formerly the Principal of the Nizam's College and, but recently the Professor of Science in the same institution. Mr. V. Chattopadhyaya had a brilliant University career before he went to England to study for the I. C. S. Examination. He passed the Madras Matriculation examination in the 1st class from the St. George's Grammar School, Hyderabad. It is unnecessary to add that he was the most brilliant student of his class and won several prizes. He did excellently well in the F. A. examination, having stood 2nd in the list of successful candidates. In the B. A. owing to causes which need not be mentioned here he took an ordinary degree, though he did well in English and stood first in Latin. After he took his degrees his venerable father sent him to England to compete for the I. C. S. Examination, in which however to the surprise of his relations and friends, he got plucked twice. After that, I suppose, he began qualifying himself for the bar.

The Chattopadhyaya family is held in the highest esteem by all classes and communities in Hyderabad, and all share their joys and sorrows. We cannot, of course, pass any judgment on the drastic action the Benchers of Middle Temple are reported to have taken; for, we are not in full possession of all the facts of the case.

But that does not prevent us from sympathising with the Chattopadhyas in their present misfortune.

Those who knew Mr. Veerendra Nath when he was here knew him to be a man of very strong will: but nobody had ever dreamt that he would write anything astounding and suffer in consequence. We all wish, however that all that has been said of him will turn out to be untrue and that he is not, in the long run, expelled. I have to add, by way of postscript, that the talented Poetess Mrs. Sarojini Naidu is Mr. Veerendra Nath's elder sister.

According to the "Daily Express," Veerendranath Chattopadhyay stated on Saturday it was probable he would appeal to the House of Lords against the decision of the Benchers of the Middle Temple. He declares that he expressed opinions which are more moderate than those held by other Indians who are not merely students like him but have been called to the Bar. He is 29, has resided in England eight years and became a student of the Middle Temple last November.

HARASSING IMPEACHMENT.—

Mr. Manekji Pataji, late of Wakant, a wealthy Parsi owner of five thousand acres of land, several saw-mills, rice mill and steam launches, has submitted a memorial to the Lieutenant-Governor praying that a searching inquiry may be made into the causes which led to the recent series of prosecutions including an indictment of murder in which either Manekji or one of his relations or assistants was accused and in each of which trials all the accused were honourably acquitted. The memorialist sets out numerous instances of irregularities committed by certain European and Burmese officials during the course of protracted legal proceedings and charges a Burmese Sub-divisional Officer with practices contravening the Criminal Procedure Code with a view to inflict the greatest possible indignities on the memorialist as an accused. Among the allegations are unnecessary handcuffing and pointing of revolver, excessive demand of bail, refusal of bail in bailable offences, wrongful restraint for days together after formal release on bail, confining the accused with criminals and felons of the worst description in the lock-up, taking of depositions in the absence of the accused, issue of annoying search warrants and the search conducted in more than one instance in the absence of the accused or any male member of his family and breaking open of safes, almirahs and boxes ostensibly to get at genuine accounts without asking for the keys and in the absence of the memorialist. Throughout the trials the investigating officers are said to have acted avowedly on information supplied by worthless witnesses set up by rival launch owners and men of no reputation. Manekji estimates his material loss to one lakh and a half and complains of mental torture extending over months, but declines to seek any monetary compensation. His single prayer is that His Honour might be pleased to bring to look for the good name of British Justice, officers who have so glaringly abused the powers invested in them by a too liberal Government. The memorialist mainly relies on the Judgment of the Sessions Judge, Mr. Wilson who displayed entire sympathy with the accused and passed strictures on the way in which evidence against Manekji was sought to be procured.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF INDIAN ART.

The religious art of India has thus been free to draw upon all life for the materials of a divine symbolism, for no part of life has been regarded as intrinsically profane or secular. Human love is an intimation of the love of God; and physical phenomena being but the symbols of spiritual reality, the religious artist has not shrunk even from sex-symbolism in his sacred art. Surely there is a great purity, and by no means the reverse, in this capacity for seeing the Divine in all things, and all things in the Divine. All life is a sacrament and there is no part of it that may not symbolize eternal and infinite realities.

There is no thought in the philosophy of Indian art of Art for Art's sake. Life is not to be represented for its own sake, for the mere giving of pleasure or display of skill, but for the sake of the Divine Idea expressed through it. Thus Sukracharya lays down—

It is always commendable for the artist to draw the images of gods. To make human figures is wrong or even impious. Even a misshapen image of God is always better than an image of man, however beautiful.

The doctrine thus so sternly stated means in other words, that imitation and portraiture are lesser aims than the representation of ideal and symbolic forms; the aim of the highest art must be the intimation of the Divinity behind all form, rather than the imitation of the form itself. One may thus depict the sport of Krishna with the Gopis, but must be in a spirit of religious idealism, not for the mere sake of the sensuous imagery itself.

The same principles are applied in the case of literary art. Thus we read in the Bhakti Kalpadruma of Pratapa Sinha :—

The poem, or any composition with all the graces possible of style that doth not tell of the acts of the Holy One, is altogether fruitless and most base.

* The whole idea of Art for Art's sake is repugnant to the Indian conception of the meaning of life. Nor has Indian art lost by this; for if it has thus first sought the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, surely all else has been added to it. The art that is Art, for Art's sake proves tasteless and insipid to those who have once realised the significance of art as a manifestation of divinity. Not long ago I witnessed the beautiful dancing of a famous dancer in a London Music Hall, and found that the impression left could be summed up in saying that however beautiful, it had no meaning, it was not religious.

How strangely this art philosophy contrasts with that characteristic of the modern West and so clearly set forth (at its best) in Browning's poem.

But why not do as well as say,— paint these Just as they are, careless what comes of it!

God's works—paint anyone...
.....Have you noticed, now, Yon cullion's hanging face? A bit of chalk

And trust me but you should though
How much more

If I drew higher things with the same truth!

That were to take the Prior's pulpit-place.

Interpret God to all of you!

For such realists this last is not the function of art; but to us it seems that the very essential function of art is to 'interpret God to all of you.'

Burne Jones, almost alone amongst artists of the modern West, seems to have understood art as we in India understand it. To a critic who named as a drawback in the work of a certain artist, that his pictures looked as if he had done them only out of his head, Burne Jones replied, 'The place where I think pictures ought to come from.'

Of impressionism as understood in the West, and the claim that breadth is gained by lack of finish, Burne Jones spoke as an Eastern artist might have done. Breadth could be got "by beautiful finish and bright clear colour well-matched, rather than by muzzy. They (the impressionists) do make atmosphere, but they don't make anything else: they don't make beauty, they don't make design, they don't make idea, they don't make anything but atmosphere and I don't think that's enough—I don't think it's very much." Of realism he spoke thus :—

Realism Direct transcript from Nature! I suppose by the time the 'photographic artist' can give us all the colours as correctly as the shapes, people will begin to find out that the realism they talk about isn't art at all but science: interesting ~~enough~~, as a scientific ~~thing~~, but nothing more. ~~Transcripts~~ from Nature, what do I want with ~~transcripts~~? I prefer her own creature: I don't want ~~reproductions~~ of her skillful....

It is the message, the 'burden' of a picture that makes its real value."

At another time he said, "You see, it is these things of the soul that are real... the only real things in the universe."

Of the religiousness of art he said :—

That was an awful thought of Burne Jones, that artists paint God for the world. There's a lump of greasy pigment at the end of Michael Angelo's hog-bristle brush, and by the time it has been laid on the stucco, there is something there that all men with eyes recognise as divine. Think of what it means. It is the power of bringing God into the world—making God manifest.

The object of art must be ~~to~~ to please or to ~~excite~~; I can't see any other reason for it at all. One is a pretty reason, the other a noble one.

Of 'Expression' in imaginative pictures he said :—

Of course my faces have no expression in the sense in which people use the word. How should they have any? They are portraits of people in paroxysms—paroxysms of terror, hatred, benevolence, desire, avarice, veneration and all the 'passions' and 'emotions' that Le Brun and that kind of person find so magnifique in Raphael's later work.....The only expression allowable in great portraiture is the expression of character and moral quality, not of anything temporary, fleeting, accidental. Apart from portraiture you don't want even so much, or very seldom: in fact you want only types, symbols, suggestions. The moment you give what people call expression, you destroy the typical characters of heads and degrade them into portraits which stand for nothing.

Common criticism of Indian art is based on a supposed or real limitation of technical attainment in representation, especially of the figure. In part, it may be answered that so little is known in the West of the real achievement of Indian art, that this idea may be allowed to die a natural death in the course of time; and in part that technical attainment is only a means, an end. There is an order of importance in the things art means to us—first, what has the artist to say? and second only, is his drawing scientifically accurate? But drawing is certainly not in itself desirable, nor good drawing a misfortune; but strange as it may seem, it has always happened in the history of art, that by the time perfection of technique has been attained, inspiration has declined. It was so in Greece, and in Europe after the Renaissance. It almost seems as if concentration upon technique hindered the free working of the imagination a little; if so, however much we desire both, do not let us make any mistake as to which is first.

Also 'accuracy' is not always even desirable. It has been shown by photography that the galloping horse has never been accurately drawn in art; let us hope it never will be. For art has to make use of abstractions and memory pictures, not of photographs; it is a synthesis, and not an analysis. The whole question of accuracy is relative; and the last word was said by Leonardo da Vinci: "The figure is best, which by its action best expresses the passion that animates it." This is the true impressionism of the East, a very different thing from impressionism as now understood in the West.

This view of art is the natural outcome of the philosophy which regards nature not as revelation, but as a veil of maya, illusion, concealing Divinity, Reality, behind. Appearances are at the most thought-forms; art is concerned not with the appearance, but with the Idea (rupa) in it. This Idea is attainable only by passing behind the veil of nature. As in religion, the method of attainment is the cultivation of the intuition or imagination, by meditation; for reality is all within. The imager is to visualise his conception, as the Hindu worshipper repeating the short penumonic mantras visualises daily the Ishta Devata. Truly, success will be in proportion, to meditation and not depend upon seeing the object itself.

Even in decorative art, the same principles hold good. The craftsman does not take a flower, set it before him and deliberately conventionalise, as he is taught to do in Schools of Art; he uses his, or rather the race-memory picture of a familiar flower; and so we see in the representation, not the flower merely, but the man and the people. When the memory is very keen we get a kind of naturalism; yet this is never imitative, but always selective, conventional and rhythmic; it is nature seen in the mirror of the human mind, not through the lens of the camera or of the eye. In traditional art, we have such memory pictures crystallised into conventional phrases handed on from generation to generation, and these phrases are the language in which the artists of one race or generation speak to another. To an alien the language is sometimes strange; to the child of the country himself, it is a mother-tongue.

Take Indian jewellery as an illustration of idealism in decorative art. The traditional forms have distinctive names, just as a curb-bracelet or a 'gipay ring' may be spoken of in England. In India the names are usually those of special flowers or fruits, or generic terms for flowers or seeds, as 'rui-flower thread,' 'coconut-flower garland,' 'petal garland,' 'string of millet-grass,' 'ear-flower,' 'hair-flower.' These names are reminiscent of the garlands of real flowers, and the flowers in the hair, that play so important a part in Indian festal dress. These, with the flowers and fruits worn as talismans or as religious symbols, are the prototypes of the flowers forms of Indian jewellery, which thus, like all other Indian art, reflects the thought, the life and the history of the people by and for whom it is so beautifully made.

The traditional forms, then, are named after flowers; but it is highly characteristic that the garlands and flowers are in design purely suggestive, not at all imitative of the prototypes. The realism which is so characteristic of nearly all modern Western art, in jewellery producing the unimaginative imitations of flowers, leaves and animals of the school of Lalique, is never found in Indian design.

The passion for imitation may be taken as direct evidence of the lack of true artistic impulse, which is always a desire, conscious or sub-conscious, to express or manifest Idea. Why indeed imitate, where you can never reveal nor is it by a conscious intellectual effort that a flower is to be conventionalised and made into applied ornament. No true Indian craftsman sets a flower before him and worries out of it some sort of ornament by taking thought; his art is more deeply rooted in the national life than that. If the flower has not meant so much to him that he has already a clear memory picture of its essential characters, he may as well ignore it in his decoration; for a decorative art not intimately related to his own experience, and to that of his fellow men, could have no intrinsic vitality, nor meet with that immediate response which rewards the prophet speaking in a mother-tongue. It is, of course true, that the original memory pictures are limited, and crystallised traditions; yet as long as the art is living, the tradition remains also plastic, and is moulded imperceptibly by successive generations. The force of its appeal is strengthened by the association of ideas—artistic, emotional and religious.

Traditional forms have thus a significance not merely foreign to any imitative art, but dependant on the fact that they represent rather race conceptions, than the ideas of one artist or a single period. They are vital expression of the race mind: to reject them, and expect great art to live on as before, would be to sever the roots of a forest tree, and still look for flowers and fruits upon its branches.

It is the same with the kind of art sometimes called high or fine. Consider for example the well known seated Buddha. Convention and tradition are in such cases held to often fetter artistic imagination. Indian art is sometimes condemned for showing no development, because there is, or is supposed to be, no difference in artistic conception between a Buddha of the first century and one of the nineteenth. It is, of course, not quite true that there is no development, in the sense that the work of each period is altogether uncharacterised; for those who know something of Indian Art are able to estimate with some confidence the century to which a statue belongs. But it is true that the conception is really the same; the mistake lies in thinking this an artistic weakness. It is an expression of the fact that the Indian ideal has not changed. What is that ideal so passionately desired? It is one-pointedness, same-mindedness, control: little by little to control the fickle and unsteady mind; little by little to win stillness, to rein in, not merely the senses, but the mind, that is as hard to the senses as the wind. As a lamp that flickers not in a windless spot, so is the mind to be at rest. Only by constant labour and passionlessness is this peace to be attained. What is the attitude of mind and body of one that seeks it? He shall be seated like the image, for that posture once acquired, is one of perfect bodily equipoise; he shall—

"With thought intent and the working of mind and sense instruments restrained, for purification of spirit labor on the yoga."

"Firm holding body, head, and neck in unmoving equipoise, gazing on the end of his nose, and looking not round about him."

"Calm of spirit, void of fear, abiding under the name of 'chaitany', with which 'chaitany' is thought to be on Mr. S. S. Chaitany that is under the name, given over to Mr.

'In this way the 'chaitany' comes to the peace that ends in 'chaitany' and that abides in 'chaitany' (Bhagavad Gita.)

How then should the greatest of India's teachers be represented in art? How otherwise than seated in this posture that is in the heart of India associated with every striving after the great ideal, and in which the Buddha himself was seated on that night when the attacks of Mara were for ever foiled, and that insight came at last, to gain which the Buddha had in countless lives sacrificed his body 'for the sake of creatures.' It was the greatest moment in India's spiritual history; and as lives in the race memory, so is it of necessity presented in the race-art.

Compare the direction in canon (Sariputra) :—

I shall now describe yogasina images (of Buddha). The tip of the nose, the thumb, and the heel must be visible to the eye of the image. The image must represent One with an unfettered, quiescent, and absolutely pure mind, preeminent from head to foot.

Such then, have been the aims and method of Indian Art in the past. Two tendencies are manifested in the Indian Art of to-day, the one inspired by the technical achievement of the modern West, the other by the spiritual idealism of the East. The former has swept away both the beauty and the limitation of the old tradition. The latter has but newly found expression; yet if the greatest art is always both National and Religious (and how empty any other art must be), it is there alone that we see the beginnings of a new and greater art, that shall fulfil and not destroy the past.
When a living Indian culture arises out of the wreck of the past and the struggle of the present, a new tradition will be born, and new vision find expression in the language of form and colour, no less than in that of words and rhythm.
The people to whom the great conceptions came are still the Indian people, and when life is strong in them again strong also will be their art. It may well be that the fruit of a deeper national life, a wider culture, and a pro-founder love, will be an art greater than any of the past. But this can only be through growth and development, not by a sudden rejection of the past. A particular convention is the characteristic expression of a period, the product of particular conditions; it resumes the historic evolution of the national culture. The convention of the future must be similarly related to the national life. We stand in relation both to past and future; in the past we made the present, the future we are moulding now, and our duty to the future, is that we should not destroy the inheritance that is the basis of the future, but that we should build on it.

PAPER-MAKING IN INDIA FROM THE EAST-INDIA COMPANY

But in China and Japan common paper is said to be still made by hand. It would be interesting to know under what conditions this has so long been possible, and what the prospects of the industry may be. It is superfluous to say that there is a good deal in common between the industrial conditions of those countries and India, for instance, the low wages of labour, the simplicity of tools, the general absence of the factory system etc. Some of the students lately sent to Japan by the Society for the Industrial and Technical Education of Indians, might look into the problem.
Government might also obtain a report from some authoritative agent on the subject. Poor, ignorant, and broken-spirited, it is hopeless to expect the Kay-jie to make any improvements in their time-honoured ways without some help from outside. It is impossible to say without an enquiry abroad whether the industry has any chance of being saved at all. The few men who are still engaged in it will soon disappear and their descendants will be forced to betake themselves to other lines of life as best as they can. And then it will be too late to make any effort to revive the industry.

V. Indigenous Process of Paper-manufacture BENGAL.

The process of manufacture is as follows:—Waste paper is mixed with lime and steeped for a week or ten days in a large earthen vat. The lime used is at the rate of three or four seers per maund of waste paper. When sufficiently softened, the mass is pounded under a 'dhenki' over a stone mortar. The 'dhenki' used for this purpose is very much like that used for husking paddy only somewhat larger and heavier and the head of the pestle is more strongly bound with iron. The stone mortar is only slightly grooved and consists of a large piece of basaltic stone, some three feet long, one and-a-half feet broad and a foot high.

The paste produced after pounding with the 'dhenki' is next kneaded thoroughly in another vat by tramping under feet like potter's clay.

The paste is now washed thoroughly in water over a piece of cotton cloth till all impurities are got rid of and a soft pulp obtained. This is now diluted with water in a large vat. The contents of the vat are constantly stirred with a rod to prevent the pulp settling down and a little is dipped up at a time in a rectangular shishon mould, called deula, resting on a low sieve. The sieve is made of reeds or bamboo strips strung together with twine. The deula is known as deula, and is used by India and to be used in the same way as ordinary paper. The deula is made of ordinary paper and is used in the same way as ordinary paper. The deula is made of ordinary paper and is used in the same way as ordinary paper.

is held firmly in position by the deele or rectangular mould pressing on its four edges. On withdrawing mould from the vat in a horizontal position the water within the deele drains off leaving the chhapri covered with a thin film of fibres, the operator meanwhile shaking the mould so as to evenly distribute the film.

The chhapri covered with the thin film of paper is now taken off from the frame and inverted over a slanting piece of stone covered with a piece of gunny cloth. The chhapri is now rolled away leaving the film of paper on the stone. The process is repeated and film after film laid down one above another forming a pile. The work is generally done in the morning and the pile is left untouched for the water to drain away till the following day when the sheets still wet are taken up one by one and laid separately on mats to dry in the sun.

After their edges have been trimmed the sheets are next sized or starched one side at a time and again dried. The starch is obtained by boiling sunned rice in water and is applied with the spongy fibrous shell of a "dhundul, nenua" or "vurul" (Luffa aegyptiana) with the outer skin removed. Some blue stone or copper sulphate is dissolved in the starch to improve the lasting quality of the paper. The starching being light work is generally done by women.

After the sheets have been dried, they are exposed to the night dew to soften them slightly, and next morning they are passed over a plank with the help of a piece of smooth stone or a conch shell. This, too, is generally done by women. The paper is now ready. The paper produced is generally white, but is sometimes coloured blue or yellow. The blue colour is imparted with indigo dissolved in the pulp vat from which the films are dipped up with the chhapri. The yellow colour is given by dissolving turmeric in the starch. Yellow paper is only produced in the Hooghly district.

The implements used, it will thus be seen, are of the crudest kind possible; they consist of some earthen vats, dhenki for pounding the waste paper, a wooden mould, a bamboo sieve (chhapri), a wooden frame for supporting the chhapri, some mats for drying the sheets, some dhundul fruits for applying the starch, and a piece of plank and a smooth stone for pressing the paper. The chhapri alone is a rather delicate thing. It is procured from Serampore in the Hooghly district where it is made. It costs from Rs. 1-4 to Rs. 2, and each piece lasts from 2½ to 3 months.

The dipping up of the pulp with the chhapri is an operation requiring some skill. One man can on an average produce 175 to 200 sheets per day (7 to 8 quires). One woman can size one side of 16 or 20 quires and polish about 12 quires of paper per day. The workmen receive from Rs. 6 to Rs. 10 or Rs. 12 per month according to their skill and out-turn of work.

One maund of waste paper makes about 30 seers of country paper.

Paper is made in several sizes :—

Bara rukhi (the width of 12 fingers laid side by side) 12 quires per Re. Sola rukhi or langri (the width of 16 fingers laid side by side) 4 or 5 quires per Re. Baira (generally used in zamindari sarishtas) 8 or 9 quires per Re. Baleswari white or blue (a thick paper only made at Amta, district Howrah) 2 quires per Re.

THE UNITED PROVINCES

The following taken from Mr. A. C. Chatterjee's Notes gives the process of manufacture still followed in a town (Muttra) of the United Provinces :—

Old paper is purchased from the Aligarh postal press and elsewhere and thoroughly soaked in water. It is then converted into thin pulp by treading and kneading. The pulp is again washed (the water of the Jumna being considered particularly suitable) and then steeped in a solution of Sajji for some days. The workman then lifts out some of this paste on a framework covered with a reed mat. This on being drained forms into a sheet, is dried by exposure to the sun, treated with flour paste and again dried. The paper is then glazed by hand rubbing and sold to local dealers. Old rags and cordage are not used in the Muttra district. The workmen are mostly Musalmans employed in a number of small factories. So far as I could estimate, about 250 persons are employed in paper-making and another seventy-five in simply glazing mill-made paper. Native traders consider such handglazed paper more durable and use it for their account books.

BRAHMACHARYYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.
THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon):—"Bramacharyya describes the life which Bramachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. L. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

The name of the MAHABHARATA has been heard of by all over the world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilized languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all, and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kuru family, Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

His Teachings, to his nephews and exemplified in his world; they are the grandest of the various phases of Hindu duties, religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, and that were ever found in any other literature. It comprises the whole of the SANAT Dharma of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Puranas.

But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in them busy day, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the SOBEREST CHARACTER OF BHISMA (not widely known or so greatly appreciated as it should be) HIS GREAT TEACHINGS, THE SOBEREST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED, the hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST, SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

Subscription—Each Part (per V. P. P.) is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis rests his great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. Reduced Rs. 1-8. Postage Extra.

FACTS AND COMMENTS.

The Kaul Judgment.

The Kaul Boycott case which has attracted some comment in the Press is one which ought to be drawn more prominently into public notice. The Settlement Patwary of Kaul together with four leading Bhumis, two Zemindars and a Brahmin of the place were charged by the police with having held a Boycott meeting which endangered the peace of the town. It is alleged that they agreed to impose a penalty upon all persons using foreign sugar after a certain date and a heavier fine on any one importing the commodity. It does not appear that there was any complaint from a single person in the neighbourhood as to any such meeting being held, still less to their being inconvenienced or stopped in their avocations by any action or threatened action on the part of the defendants. But on the ipse dixit of the complaining constable the defendants were found guilty and bound over to keep the peace. The defendants themselves denied the meeting and alleged that they took no part in politics and were guiltless of any religious objection to foreign sugar. In itself the case appears to be a judicial vagary of the worst kind. But the remarkable pronouncements of the Sub-divisional officer of Kaithal on the juristic aspects of the case make it of more than local importance. Mr Garret in his judgment starts a very surprising metaphysical argument by drawing a nice distinction between illegal non-legal and wrongful acts. Illegal acts are those against which the law provides a penalty either by criminal or civil action. Non-legal acts are those which are contrary to public policy but are left to social opinion to discourage. Wrongful acts, according to Mr Garret, are those which, being neither illegal nor nonlegal, are yet abhorrent to the moral sense of men of reason. We do not know if this remarkable definition of wrongful acts will be supported by lawyers. But Mr Garret further improves on these distinctions by assevering on the strength of an Irish judgment that a perfectly legal action becomes illegal when it is done by many persons in combination, provided any one can show that his interests as an individual or as one of a class are aimed at or necessarily injured. In order that we may not be accused of misrepresenting the learned Sub-divisional Officer we quote the words of the judgment. "Without quoting chapter, verse and date I call to mind the judgment of the late Lord Chief Justice of Ireland I believe, Baron Rolleston, in what is known as the Baker's Case. In that case it was held that the baker had a cause of action against the farmers of the village in which he established a bakery because they combined to boycott his bakery by each establishing a kitchen for the preparation of the bread for themselves and their servants, their motive being simply a difference on political grounds. The Irish farmers did not go so far as the defendants are said to have gone in this case, and they in nowise interfered with the baker personally. The illegality of their action consisted in their combining to do an act which if done separately would have been legal. The learned Judge observed to the effect that, whereas a single man may be left to work out his own salvation when opposed by an individual, he could claim protection from a combination. In that case there were no proposals to inflict fines or outrage, yet the act was held illegal. It is very certain therefore that an act which in violence far outstrips that, is, if not illegal, at least wrongful.

The Implications in the judgment.

That is the judgment. It is obvious that these remarkable dicta have very wide implications and, if upheld, make every combination harmful to personal or class interests impossible under the law. That has been for some time the tendency of magisterial decisions in India. Every action for instance which may be objectionable to a number of Mahomedans is now liable to be forbidden because it is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and one is dimly beginning to wonder whether the day may not yet come when worship in Hindu temples may be forbidden on that valid ground. Under Mr. Garrett's dictum it seems to depend purely on the bias of the judge what action will or will not be allowed by the law. A totalitarian judge may easily penalise a party of men going into a public house to drink because it is an action abhorrent to his moral sense as a man of reason. And certainly it would not be unarguable that such a combined action might very easily lead to a breach of the peace, much more easily than the meeting of a few hundred or thousand men on the Boycott day. By his other dictum every caste decision forbidding a breach of caste rules is a punishable act, every trade strike is a punishable act, every National School Committee is liable to an action under the law for injuring the interests of the local Government school, every big concern aiming at the extinction in a locality of the retail shopkeeper and the capture of his business commits a wrongful act, or an illegal act, it is not clear which, all Swadeshi, Boycott, National Education movements are objectionable. The Tariff Reform movement itself is only saved by being directed against men outside the country even if it is so saved, for after all it affects adversely the middlemen who bring in foreign manufactures. Even if, driven beyond endurance by my dhobis delays, I combine with some friends to open and patronise a laundry, I can be stopped by a magisterial sympathiser with the rights of the individual. If this is Irish law, all we can say is that it is very Irish indeed and we do not yearn to have it imported into India. The object of the learned Magistrate was no doubt to aim a blow at the Swadeshi movement which is probably abhorrent to his moral sense as a man of reason. The Sessions Judge has refused to interfere with the discretion of the executive, but there is more here concerned than the discretion of the executive. There is a very original and far-reaching elucidation of the law behind the executive discretion. We hope that the victimised citizens of Kaul will carry their appeal higher and get a more authoritative pronouncement on the juristic philosophy of the learned Mr. Garret.

The Social Boycott.

The reason why we have drawn so much attention to this case, is its intimate connection with the question of Social Boycott. We are advocates of this weapon not in all cases, but in circumstances where milder expedients are impotent to prevent a wound to the body social or body politic by refractory or conscienceless individuals who wish to enjoy all the benefits of social existence while disregarding the vital necessities of the society. We are aware of the grave consequences of the misuse of the social boycott to prevent the legitimate exercise by the individual of his free reason and honest conviction. We therefore advocate it only in very serious instances where the whole community is attacked in a vital point and is practically at one in resenting the act as fatally injurious to it. For instance when the turbulent Mahomedans of Eastern Bengal made an organised attack on the property of Hindus and on the honour of Hindu women, the Hindu community of East Bengal would have been perfectly justified in boycotting Mahomedans as servants. Similarly, now that the educated classes of the Hindu community are at one in the belief that the Swadeshi movement supported by Boycott is necessary to the economical existence of their community, to say nothing of the whole nation, they are justified in refusing to have any dealings with those who out of personal and selfish motives deal a blow at that movement by persisting in the purchase of foreign articles. The use of this weapon of self-defence by Hindu castes became hurtful because it was applied without discrimination and not always with honesty. Had it been confined to cases of gross moral depravity destructive of social order, there would have been no revolt against it. The penalising of the pursuit of education in foreign countries and similar blunders recoiled on the caste system and it is notable that communities with a strong democratic commonsense like the Mahrattas have even while adhering to orthodox religion avoided the worst of these errors. But the misuse of a necessary instrument is no argument against its necessary and discriminating use. We hold the use of this instrument, not in all cases but in the most heinous, to be legitimate in protecting the life of the nation.

The Law and the Nationalist.

There are several points connected with the national movement in which the law is in a state of dangerous uncertainty. The exact limit of sedition is one of them, the matter of social boycott is another. We believe that social boycott involving no violence or direct coercion is perfectly legal but it is certain that not only the Anglo-Indian community at large but a portion of the judiciary would be glad to find it illegal. Any doubt on such subjects ought to be removed, for although ignorance is in itself no excuse in law, it ought to be a defence when it is created by the uncertainties of the law itself. We think the Nationalists ought to take every opportunity of testing the extent of the liberties still allowed to us in the ordinary course of the law. We are aware that a section of Nationalist opinion has held that our principle of Swadeshi-Boycott ought to debar us from taking any part in any legal proceedings whatever. While many of us have openly expressed our admiration for the heroic stoicism with which this principle has been adhered to in many cases, we have not held it binding on any except those fine consciences to whom it appealed nor would we allow it to guide our own action. We hold that no Nationalist should resort to the British Courts under the present political conditions as against a brother Nationalist or in any circumstances which give him a real choice. If he is dragged to the criminal or civil courts by others he is entitled to defend himself to the end by all the means that the law provides. If arbitration is refused in a case where his interests are attacked, he is absolved from the self-denying obligation, or if the law of the land compels him as a landholder or propertied or business man to protect himself by certain legal forms, it is obvious that he cannot deny himself that protection without imperilling work or wealth necessary to nation. The same overriding rule of necessity which compels us to exclude machinery and other instruments of education, work and production from the Boycott, limits the application of the arbitration principle and the abstention from British Courts. Formerly we were content to go our way in doubtful cases, such as the limits of the law of sedition, putting our own interpretation and taking the consequences of a too elastic reading of the law. We even held ourselves justified in the case of unjust and arbitrary laws in breaking them not by violence but peacefully and passively, as the Dissenters did in England, so as to get them either tested or altered. This we still hold to be morally and politically justifiable. But the outbreak of Terrorism compels us to restrict our circle of passive resistance lest even by the most peaceful rejection of unjust laws we should seem to be encouraging lawlessness and disorder. Still, if we are to observe the law scrupulously, just or unjust, we must know what the law is, and now that there is a man at the head of judicial administration who knows the law and tries to keep to it, we ought to take advantage of this now unusual circumstance and use every opportunity to fix the legal position of our movement and its methods.

THE HUGHLY RESOLUTIONS.

We publish in this issue the draft resolutions of the Hugly Reception Committee which have reached our hands in a printed form. Formerly our information had been that the Committee had based its resolutions on the Pabna Conference resolutions and preserved them in the spirit if not in the letter. We regret to find that this information was erroneous. While appreciating the labours of the Committee we cannot pretend to be satisfied at the result. The letter of the Pabna resolutions has been preserved in a few cases and their manly and dignified character contrasts strangely with the company in which they are found, but for the most part the mass of the resolutions represent an attempt to go back to the tone of appeal, prayer and protest which Bengal had decided to give up, until the concession of real control should impart to these forms the sense of power which can alone save them from the stamp of a futile mendicancy. The phrasing also of these draft resolutions seems to us to be defective. The pronouncements of opinion of a public assembly of this standing ought to be free from an undignified effusiveness, prolixity or argumentativeness. Whatever argument is needed beyond what is barely necessary for an adequate expression of the assembly's opinion on the subject in hand, should be reserved for the speeches. That too is the proper place for enthusiasm, eloquence and rhetoric. To import those elements into the resolutions themselves is to import into the assembly's pronouncements an appearance of immaturity and inexperienced youthfulness not conducive to its dignity in the eyes of those who are accustomed to the serious handling of weighty affairs. Two of the resolutions, quite apart from other objections, travel beyond the scope of the assembly by their local character. The proper place for such resolutions is the District Conference and the mere fact of the larger assembly being held in a particular district does not change the character of the Conference whose business is to express the opinion and guide the public activities of the people of Bengal in matters affecting the country and the province as a whole. These resolutions deal with particular local interest of the people of Hugly and the riparian towns and districts on the banks of the Ganges. If the Conference is to handle local matters, there is no reason why they should ignore similar wants and necessities in the districts of East Bengal. Finally, there are two questions of national importance in which the Nationalist party holds views connected with a distinct policy and on which it is necessary to know the opinion of the country, and in these two matters the resolutions of the Committee do not satisfy us. The resolution on the Reforms contains a parenthesis which is unwarranted by the facts and will have the effect of committing the people of Bengal to the acceptance of the reforms with all their vital imperfections and disastrous tendencies. The resolution on the Congress, while unexceptionable in sentiment, has the vital defect of not dealing with the crucial questions at issue or showing a way to the realisation of the desirable consummation advocated. At Pabna there was a distinct means pointed out and, since that has been rendered null and void, the people of Bengal must take other means as definite and more decisive to see that their wishes are no longer ignored. To call on the leaders is to express merely a pious wish and the time has gone by when in this matter the action can be left to the discretion of the leaders. They may ignore the resolution in their action or say that they could find no means of carrying out the wishes of the Conference.

In view of these defects the Nationalist party in Calcutta have drawn up a number of draft resolutions and amendments of the Reception Committee's draft which they propose to bring forward before the Subjects Committee. We hold it imperative that in these matters there should be no unnecessary secrecy or hole and corner action. We have nothing to conceal either from the Government, the people or those whose opinions may differ from ours. Our propaganda is open, frank and democratic. The actual details of action, when action is in our hands, are best discussed in Cabinets and private Committees, but in a people striving to be free and democratic deliberation must be public and policy openly and fully expressed. Unfortunately, the late period at which we were able to procure a copy of the draft resolutions and the necessity of immediate action have made it impossible to circulate the draft in time to receive the opinions of Mofussil Nationalists or even to consult all who are in Calcutta. We have however sent copies to the Mofussil and hope that the delegates will be ready with any suggestions they may have to make when they meet at Hugly. The want of a Nationalist daily at this time is being severely felt; we have to do what we can with the means at our disposal.

The alterations made in the Committee's draft have been dictated by the considerations above stated. We have thought it right to adhere to the decision arrived at by us at Pabna to clear our politics of all that is low and humiliating in tone and substance and to make self-reliance, self-respect and a manly expression of opinion the east of our public resolutions. There are certain matters in which the ultimate decision rests with the Government and yet in which the people are bound to express their opinion, but so long as they have no recognised instrument through which they can bring their weight to bear in these matters, all they can do is to place their opinion on record and leave to the Government the responsibility of ignoring the opinion of a whole province. The expression of opinion is addressed to the people of this province and of the whole country; it is their sympathy and moral support we seek and we do not wish to appeal to an authority which is not bound to listen to or consider our appeals and protests and with whom even the reception of public resolutions by great bodies representing whole populations is a matter of rare condescension and favour. When we have a direct and effective share in administration, then will be the time to submit representation and protest to a Government which will be partly ours. In our draft resolutions everything expressing this attitude of appeal and unavailing objurgation has been rigorously excluded and in only one instance we have followed the precedent of the Pabna Conference in making a demand, not because we expect it to be fruitful but to mark a strong sense of the serious breach of a definite promise with which the authorities have long been charged and the nonfulfilment of an elementary obligation binding on all Governments popular or democratic which ranks along with the preservation of order and the defence of the country from foreign invasion. We were somewhat opposed to the making even of this demand at the time of the Pabna Conference, but now that the authorities profess a willingness to reform the administration and claim co-operation on our part, it is advisable to emphasize the serious failings which make co-operation under present conditions impossible and to indicate the conditions which can alone make co-operation of a real kind possible to the people. The draft resolutions on Councils Reform, local self-government and the improvement of judicial administration have the latter purpose in view. Purely local resolutions we propose to omit. We have restored in our draft the Pabna resolution on the Boycott; we do not see any sufficient reason for departing from the Pabna wording whether to lower the tone or to enter into an unnecessary justification of the legitimate character of the Boycott which a body like the Conference long committed to the movement ought to take for granted. We have omitted the first clause of the Education Resolution for the same reasons which motivated its exclusion at Pabna and especially because we look with suspicion on mass education entirely under official control. If primary education is placed under free District Boards, there will be no farther objection; otherwise we must confine ourselves to the effective extension of National Education to the primary stage. We totally reject the resolution on the Terrorist outrages which no Bengal Conference ought to pass after the speech of the Lieutenant Governor which still stands on record and has not been withdrawn. Sir Edward Baker distinctly declared that the Government has no farther use for mere denunciations of the outrages however fervently worded and he has thrown on the whole country the responsibility for the cessation of the assassinations or their continuance. The suitable course for the Conference is to dissociate itself in a dignified manner from all forms of violence and quietly remind the authorities that the atmosphere in which the worst forms of political crime can alone exist is of their creation and the means of eradicating them in their hands. The people are helpless spectators of this miserable strife and the Conference has no right to pass any resolution which would even by implication admit their responsibility.

There remain the questions of Reform and the Congress. On the former we have already stated the attitude of the Nationalist party which is not irreconcilable on the point but refuses to countenance any reform which does not begin the concession of self-government. Especially is it impossible for us to accept a measure which introduces permanent elements of discord and maims the growing national sentiment by perpetuating divisions, to say nothing of the false and vicious principles, destructive of democratic development on which it is based. The reform ensures us nothing but an increase in the number of nominated and elected members and a non-official, not an elective, majority. It also holds out to us a promise of ampler discussion, interpellation and division. But the rules for formation of electorates, election and the conduct of business as well as the admissibility of particular elections and an unqualified power of veto are all in the hands of the authorities. There might be an increase of moral weight behind a popular opinion or protest, but equally there might be an increase of moral weight behind the Government if they can succeed in passing anti-national measures by a majority of members, official, nominated and elected from convenient electorates, as approved by a majority in a reformed Council. In any case we would not think so doubtful and trivial a concession worth accepting,—for gratitude for concessions implies acceptance of the concessions,—and when it is practically an inducement for consenting to the permanent mutilation of the body politic and offered without amnesty, cessation of repressive measures or release of the deportees it is binding on the Nationalist delegates to stand or fall by the rejection of the measure.

In the matter of an united Congress we have pointed out that it is imperatively necessary to provide a means by which the desired union can be brought about. The difficulties in the way of union are two, the creed and the Constitution. The Constitution of the body now calling itself the Congress has been framed and imposed on it without consulting even that body and it is well known that many members of the Moderate party refuse to join a body constituted by a means which, even if it were not ultra vires, would be as arbitrary as the most arbitrary action of which even Lord Curzon's Government was ever guilty. The Nationalists on their part insist that they cannot be called on to accept a Constitution of many clauses of which they disapprove and which was imposed on a body from which they were specially excluded. The call on them to join a body which insists on their forswearing their fundamental principles before they enter, is still more absurd. Therefore a freely elected Congress constituted on the old lines is the only solution and the Conference must decide that point if it is serious in its desire. Our draft resolution provides a means by which negotiations can be carried on by Bengal with the other provincial leaders and the organisers of what is called the Lahore Congress and, in case of unanimity proving impossible, for the assembling of a real united Congress on the initiative of Bengal in co-operation with all who desire union. We admit that the success of the plan depends on its acceptance by the Bengal Moderates, but we believe it was substantially this idea which the deported Moderate leader S. Krishna Kumar Mitra was trying to get carried out when he was arrested. We see no reason why Bengal Moderates should object to it. At any rate this is the Nationalist proposal.

In addition to these amendments and substitutions we have appended two additional resolutions to which there ought to be no objection. One of them is in the Pabna list and we do not know why it should be omitted.

BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

MUGL-1931
Draft Resolutions.

I. That this Conference places on record its profound feelings of regret and sorrow at the death of Lord Ripon who has justly been called the father of local self-government in India and whose policy of justice and righteousness will for ever enshrine his memory in the hearts of the people of this country. This Conference also urges that immediate steps should be taken to perpetuate his memory.

II. (a) That this Conference is of opinion that the system of Government obtaining in the self-governing British Colonies should be extended to India.

(b) That while expressing its gratefulness to the Government for the concessions made in the recent Reform Scheme, this Conference records its firm conviction that no reform will ensure the happiness and contentment of the people unless it gives them a direct control over the finances of the country.

(c) That this Conference is further of opinion that any undue favour in the matter of representation in the Councils which may be shown to any particular community cannot fail to encourage sectarianism in the different communities and to create dissensions and political troubles amongst them.

(d) That this Conference also urges the Government to publish the rules framed in accordance with Lord Morley's Scheme before they are finally adopted.

III. (a) That this Conference declines to accept the Partition of Bengal as a settled fact of question and resolves to continue the agitation against it with a view to its reversal or modification.

(b) That in this connection this Conference appeals to the Government of India to act in the spirit of His Majesty's assurance in his recent message that the rectification of errors has ever been one of the guiding principles of British Government in India.

IV. That this Conference urges the people to continue the boycott of foreign goods which is in its opinion a perfectly legitimate movement and is calculated to hasten the political as well as economic betterment of the country.

NATIONALIST DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

I. That this Conference places on record its sorrow at the death of Lord Ripon who was an earnest and sincere sympathiser with Indian aspirations and did much for the cause of local self-government.

II. (a) As in the Committee's draft.

(b) That this Conference emphatically condemns the principle of separate electorates on sectarian lines and of special privileges for one community which it is intended to introduce into the Reform Scheme and is further of the opinion that no reform will be acceptable to the country which does not concede to the people a direct and substantial control over finance and legislation.

The rest to be omitted.

III. As in the Committee's draft but clause (b) to be omitted.

IV. That this Conference records its fullest support to the Boycott movement and is of opinion that further attention shall be paid to the political aspect and as a measure of self-protection.

V. That the Conference con-

BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

MUGLY-1908.
Draft Resolutions.

I. That this Conference places on record its profound feelings of regret and sorrow at the death of Lord Ripon who has justly been called the father of local self-government in India and whose policy of justice and righteousness will for ever enshrine his memory in the hearts of the people of this country. This Conference also urges that immediate steps should be taken to perpetuate his memory.

II. (a) That this Conference is of opinion that the system of Government obtaining in the self-governing British Colonies should be extended to India.

(b) That while expressing its gratefulness to the Government for the concessions made in the recent Reform Scheme, this Conference records its firm conviction that no reform will ensure the happiness and contentment of the people unless it gives them a direct control over the finances of the country.

(c) That this Conference is further of opinion that any undue favour in the matter of representation in the Councils which may be shown to any particular community cannot fail to encourage sectarianism in the different communities and to create dissensions and political troubles amongst them.

(d) That this Conference also urges the Government to publish the rules framed in accordance with Lord Morley's Scheme before they are finally adopted.

III. (a) That this Conference declines to accept the Partition of Bengal as a settled fact or question and resolves to continue the agitation against it with a view to its reversal or modification.

(b) That in this connection this Conference appeals to the Government of India to act in the spirit of His Majesty's assurance in his recent message that the rectification of errors has ever been one of the guiding principles of British Government in India.

IV. That this Conference urges the people to continue the Boycott of foreign goods which is in its opinion a perfectly legitimate movement and is calculated to stimulate the political as well as industrial and economic life of the country.

V. That this Conference urges the people to continue the Boycott of foreign goods which is in its opinion a perfectly legitimate movement and is calculated to stimulate the political as well as industrial and economic life of the country.

NATIONALIST DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

I. That this Conference places on record its sorrow at the death of Lord Ripon who was an earnest and sincere sympathiser with Indian aspirations and did much for the cause of local self-government.

II. (a) As in the Committee's draft.

(b) That this Conference emphatically condemns the principle of separate electorates on sectarian lines, and of special privileges for one community which it is intended to introduce into the Reform Scheme and is further of the opinion that no reform will be acceptable to the country which does not concede to the people a direct and substantial control over finance and legislation.

The rest to be omitted.

III. As in the Committee's draft but clause (b) to be omitted.

IV. That this Conference records its fullest support to the Boycott movement and recommends its further extension both as a political weapon and as a measure of economic protection.

V. This is the Purna resolution.

VI. As in the Reception Committee's draft.

BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

HUGLI—1909.

Draft Resolutions.

VI. That this Conference places on record its emphatic and unqualified condemnation of the detestable outrages and deeds of violence which have been recently committed and is of opinion that such acts will retard the progress of the country.

VII. (a) That this Conference records its emphatic protest against the repressive measures adopted by the Government and especially against the deportation of nine Bengali gentlemen without trial or charge and further protests against the persistent refusal of the Government to furnish any information regarding the charges against them and to give them an opportunity of exculpating themselves. This Conference considers the immediate release of the deportees as absolutely necessary in the interests of justice and fair-play.

(b) That having regard to the grave risk of injustice involved in Government action based upon ex parte and untested informations and to the penal laws of the country, this Conference urges upon the Government the repeal of the Bengal Regulation III of 1818.

VIII. That having regard to the prevalence of Cholera, Malaria and Smallpox in the province throughout the year and the abnormal death rate as disclosed in the last Sanitary Report of Bengal, this Conference urges the Government as well as the people to adopt amongst others the following measures:—

(1) The sinking of wells and the excavation and reservation of tanks in the villages for purely drinking purposes.

(2) The draining of the rural areas.

(3) The clearing of jungle in the inhabited areas of towns and villages.

(4) The prevention of noxious discharges from septic tanks into the River Hugli which form the principal cause of Cholera in the riparian towns and villages on both banks of the said river.

NATIONALIST DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

VI. That this Conference looks with strong disapproval on all methods of violence and holds that the furtherance of the national movement should be effected by peaceful and legitimate means, and it warns the authorities that the policy of repression stimulates terrorist activity and the best way to paralyse it is to restore normal conditions.

VII. That this Conference emphatically condemns the repressive measures adopted by the Government and especially the deportation of nine Bengali gentlemen without trial or charge and considers their immediate release and the repeal of the Bengal Regulation III of 1818 as the only way to assuage the profound discontent created by these measures.

VIII. That inasmuch as the Government has failed hitherto to redeem its pledges with regard to the application of the Road Cess for the purposes originally intended and has not fulfilled its duties with regard to the improvement of sanitation in rural areas, the Conference demands the fulfilment of this duty and the organisation of adequate measures for the provision of good drinking water, medical aid and proper drainage of the country.

N. B. This is the Panna resolution with some verbal modifications.

BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

HUGLI—1909.

Draft Resolutions.

IX. That this Conference recommends—

(a) That all local self-governing bodies and Panchayets should, without further delay, be vested with powers to elect their own Chairman.

(b) That the principle of representation should be extended to village Union Committees and Panchayets.

(c) That the Union Committees should be vested with powers to initiate and carry on measures for the sanitary improvement of the areas within their jurisdiction and that grants of money should be made to them for that purpose.

X. (a) That this Conference urges the Government to take immediate action on their circular on free primary education issued about three years ago and invites their attention to the fact that the grant in aid of technical and scientific education are not at all commensurate with the needs of the country.

(b) That in view of the recent educational policy of the Government which has practically closed the doors of the University against many students of the province and the necessity of organising a system of literary, scientific, technical and industrial education suited to the requirements of the country, this Conference urges the people to take steps to establish educational institutions throughout the country on national lines and under national control.

XI. (a) That, while recording its satisfaction at the recognition by the Government of India of the principle of separation of Judicial from Executive functions, this Conference regrets that effect has not yet been given to it.

(b) That this Conference is of opinion that the only effective method of reforming the Police is to separate the Judicial from the Executive functions and that no scheme for such separation will be successful unless all the Judicial Officers are placed under the direct control and supervision of the High Court.

(c) That this Conference is further of opinion that for the better administration of Civil and Criminal justice in the country, the District and Sessions Judges should be recruited from among the ranks of the legal profession.

NATIONALIST DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

IX. That this Conference is of opinion that local self-governing bodies including Panchayets and Village Union Committees should be entirely elected on the principle of popular representation and freed from official control and that Village Union committees should be vested with powers and provided with the necessary funds to carry on sanitary improvements.

X. That in the opinion of this Conference steps should be taken for promoting a system of education literary, technical and scientific suited to the requirements of the country on national lines and under national control and maintaining national schools throughout the country Clause (a) is omitted.

XI. That this Conference is of opinion that the separation of judicial from executive functions, which has been recognised in principle, should be forthwith put into effect and all judicial officers placed under the direct control and supervision of the High Court and that provision should be made in the scheme for the District and Sessions Judges being appointed in future from the ranks of the legal profession in this country.

BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE PERFECTED MUGLY—1909. Draft Resolution.

XII. That this Conference enters a strong protest against the Calcutta Police Bill which is an un-called-for measure of an absolutely retrograde character and which will restrict the freedom of action of the people in Calcutta and will subject them to unscrupulous harassments.

XIII. (a) That in view of the large surplus under the head of Stamp Revenue and the growing poverty of the people, this Conference urges upon the Government the necessity of reducing the Court fees levied for the institution of suits and complaints.

(b) That having regard to the ruinous expenses of litigation in Courts of law, this Conference is of opinion that arbitration Courts should be established throughout the country.

XIV. That with a view to mitigate the hardship arising from chronic high prices of food stuffs, this Conference urges on the District Associations the necessity of establishing Co-operative Banks and Stores with Dharamagolas throughout the country.

XV. That in view of the ravages of wild animals and the frequent dacoities in the towns and villages, this Conference appeals to the Government to repeal the Arms Act.

XVI. That this Conference views with apprehension the decrease in the normal growth of the Bengali Hindu population and hereby appoints a Committee consisting of the following gentlemen to ascertain the causes which have led to this state of things and to suggest what steps should be taken to prevent it.

XVII. That this Conference, while sympathising with the Indian residents of South Africa in their struggle for equal rights and privileges with the White population and admiring their firm attitude, places on record its deep sense of indignation at the gross wrongs inflicted on them and suggests the adoption of Boycott of Colonial and British goods by other Provinces of India by way of protest and retaliation.

NATIONALIST DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

XII. As in the Committee's draft except that in place of "enters a strong protest against" should be put "strongly condemns"

XIII. Omit clause (a), otherwise as in the Committee's draft.

XIV. As in the Committee's draft

XV. That in view of the ravages of wild animals and frequent dacoities in the towns and villages against which there is no adequate protection, this Conference is of opinion that the Arms Act should be repealed or radically modified.

XVI. As in the Committee's draft.

XVII. As in the Committee's draft, except that after "firm attitude" should be inserted "and heroic sufferings".

BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE. HUGLI—1909.

Draft Resolutions.

XVIII. That having regard to the gradual diminution of commons or pasture land for cattle, this Conference urges the Government and the people specially the land-holding classes to adopt measures for the protection and preservation of cows and oxen.

XIX. That this Conference is of opinion that the Government grants of money for drainage and irrigation purposes in Bengal which is essentially an agricultural Province are lamentably inadequate for its needs and urges the Government to take the following steps at an early date:—

1. The dredging of the Bhagirathi.
2. The immediate adoption of the measures recommended by Mr. Horn and other expert engineers for the prevention of the annual floods in the Arambagh Sub-division by the overflow water of the Begua Breach.
3. The draining of the Kadua Math in the Amta basin in the District of Howrah.

XX. That in the present situation of the country united action being highly desirable, this Conference earnestly appeals to the leaders to bring about a compromise between the two wings of the Indian Nationalist party and to arrange for holding a United Congress.

XXI. That with a view to inaugurate a vigorous system of self-help and voluntary work for the redress of their grievances, this Conference urges the people to organise village Committees, Sub-Divisional Associations and District Associations.

NATIONALIST DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

XVIII. As in the Committee's draft, except that the words "the Government and" should be omitted.

XIX. Omit,

XX. That this Conference considers an United Congress imperatively necessary in the interests of the country and believes that the best way to bring about union is to hold a session elected as in all Congresses up to 1906, to which any future arrangements for the procedure of the Congress shall be submitted.

(b) That in this view it appoints the following Committee to confer on behalf of the province with the organisers of the meeting at Lahore and with other provincial leaders for the holding of such a session and it further empowers the Committee in case of necessity to propose and arrange for this session being held in Calcutta in co-operation with all who are desirous of union.

XXI. As in the Committee's draft, omitting only the words "and voluntary work for the redress of their grievances."

Additional Resolutions.

1. That this Conference is of opinion that two of the most necessary and important classes of enterprise from the point of view of our commercial development are (1) Swadeshi Banks and (2) Steam Navigation Companies to control the waterways of Bengal, and urges on the country the necessity of initiating and supporting such enterprises, and it expresses its appreciation of the efforts of those who have already undertaken work of this kind.

2. That the Conference is of opinion that physical training is encouraged by all means to fuse greater manliness in the younger generation and make them able of self-reliance and defence.

Bengal Provincial Congress Committee.

The Madras Standard seems to think that the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee has acted neither very discreetly nor very decently by nominating Mr. Surendranath Banerjee for the Presidency of the next Congress to be held at Lahore. This is evidently owing to a misapprehension which needs to be cleared up. When the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee was asked in June last to recommend a name for the President of the next Congress, this Committee sent up the name of the Hon'ble Nawab Syed Mahmud of Madras and two other names for the purpose. It soon transpired that the Nawab was reluctant to accept the honour and the other two names were not supported by the other Provincial Committees. The various Provincial Committees having failed to come to an unanimity on the subject, fresh recommendations again became necessary. On this occasion the Committee had not a blank cheque to fill but had to confine its recommendation to a list, circulated by the Lahore Reception Committee, containing names of persons who had been suggested for the Presidency by one or other of the Provincial Committees. The three most eligible names in this list, barring that of the Hon'ble Nawab Bahadur of Madras, stood in the following order:—

1. Sir Pherozeshah Metah.
2. Mr. G. K. Gokhale.
3. Mr. Surendranath Banerjee.

Considering the strong prejudice that existed in Bengal against Sir Pherozeshah, the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee, in spite of pressure from outside, did not venture to put forward his name for the Presidency of the next Congress. Indeed, prejudice still runs so high against Sir Pherozeshah on this side of the country that Bengal may be obliged to keep away from the next Congress in case he is elected its President. As for Mr. Gokhale, his unhappy Poona speech has disappointed all his friends and supporters in these provinces and has brought in a strong reaction against his popularity. The Bengal Committee would have hardly justified its existence as a representative body if it completely ignored or put aside the intensity of public feeling in both parts of Bengal against the nomination of either Sir Pherozeshah or Mr. Gokhale for the Presidency of the next Congress. Putting aside the names, Mr. Surendranath Banerjee's name (which originally came into the list at the instance of some other province) now remained as the only alternative for acceptance by the Bengal Committee, and thus from his laurels in England, he was considered as perhaps the most desirable person to guide the deliberations of the next Congress. It is the nearest accident that Banerjee was in England at the time that he had the honour to preside twice over the Congress was considered much of a misfortune. The Bengal Committee could not help these facts and therefore recommended Mr. Banerjee's name as the only possible name under the circumstances.—Lahore Press.

THE NEWSPAPER "JUSTICE".—

In the House of commons Mr. Borne asked why the newspaper "Justice" published in England was forbidden entry into India. The Master of Elibank replied:—"The Government of India have informed Lord Morley that they regard the articles published in the "Justice" as inflammatory and mischievous. Lord Morley entirely concurs." The Pioneer comments on it as follows. The Master of Elibank has informed Mr. Will Thorne why the circulation of the newspaper Justice is prohibited in India. The Under-Secretary might have replied in the words of the Quaker, "Friend, first thee tellest a lie; and then thee askest a question." Copies of Justice undoubtedly reached India by the last mail and were duly circulated, though they bore the name of the paper on the wrapper in flaming red letters an inch long."

CONDITION OF INDIANS IN TRANSVAAL.—

Mr. Hart-Davies presented a petition from 8,500 Indians in the Madras Presidency praying that the House of Commons would consider the condition of the Indians in the Transvaal and that the Asiatic Criminal Amendment Act should be repealed.

THE INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST.—

Mr. Aldred, Printer of the "Indian sociologist" was charged at Bow Street with printing and publishing a scandalous libel concerning the King's Government in India. Mr. Bodkin, K. C. in prosecuting said:—"The prosecution would disclose very serious matters with reference to the dissemination of seditious printing in Great Britain and elsewhere. The defendant was clearly a person of anarchist views. He was known to associate with anarchists in London and had been in communication with Krishna Varma. The paper was published for the express purpose of advocating Indian independence and to further the Indian Nationalist movement. It preached the doctrines intended for the subversion of the Government of India. The accused admitted printing 1,500 copies, one thousand of which were sent to Paris. He was remanded on bail."

ABOLITION OF DUTIES IN BARODA STATE.—

With the object of further promoting trade and manufactures within his territories, His Highness Gaekwar has issued an order that all frontier duties on imports be now abolished. The net revenue surrendered by this measure is estimated at over four lakhs of rupees. This order shall not apply to sea-side talukas of Kodinari and Okhamandal or to such duties as are imposed in Poroda, and Ameli districts and are mainly derived from Baroda cotton. His Highness has pleased to abolish all export duties which are estimated to bring revenue of about a lakh and half.

TEA CULTURE IN E. BENGAL.—

From an official report just published on Tea Culture in Eastern Bengal during 1908 we gather that the largest amount of new planting was done in the Jalpaiguri district and the largest area of old tea abandoned was in Cooch. The total area of land comprised within tea estates increased during the year by 33 per cent from 1,35,269 to 1,96,607 acres, of which 30 per cent is actually under tea. Owing to a successful recruiting season, there has been an increase of 5 per cent in the number of labourers employed during the year, against a falling off as noticed in the report for 1907. The number of permanent labourers rose in all parts of the province, except Kamrup. Although temporary labourers indicate a decline for most tea districts, the total for the province shows an increase.

CATTLE IN BURMA.—

The year ending June 1909 is reported to have been the first in which an effective census of the agricultural stock of Burma was made by the Land Records Department. The year is said to have been very good one for cattle owners the only serious outbreaks of cattle disease having been confined to three or four districts. In the Delta district bullocks are reported to be replacing buffaloes for agricultural purposes.

THE BURMA PONY.—

It is understood that a scheme has been sanctioned for the improvement of the indigenous breed of that interesting and valuable, though lately neglected animal, the Burma pony. The Provincial Veterinary Department will now carefully control operations and the scheme provides for the formation as a nucleus of a small select stud of Shan stallions for breeding purposes, a Special Deputy Superintendent being appointed to the Veterinary Department to directly supervise operations.

We cannot here give a detailed account of all these mills, but the following reference to the Lucknow mills which is mainly under Indian management, taken from Mr. A. C. Chatterjee's Notes mentioned above, would be of interest to our readers.

"The mill at Lucknow," says Mr. Chatterjee, "affords a striking instance of successful business enterprise on modern lines managed to a large extent by Indians. The paid up capital in 1905-06 was eight lakhs of rupees, and seven hundred daily labourers are employed on the average. The following descriptions of paper were manufactured—printing, brown, coloured blotting, white and buff cartridge, cream and yellow wove, azule and coloured wrappers. The production in 1904 was 5,496 thousand pounds, or roughly, about sixty-seven thousand maunds, valued at six lakhs and eighty-two thousand rupees."

The mill supplies largely to Government, and from the absence of advertising, one concludes that it experiences no difficulty in the disposal of its produce.

The materials most in use at the Lucknow mills are (1) rags, (2) old paper, (3) baub or Bhabar grass from Nepal through Bahraich and Gonda, (4) old hemp cordage collected in Southern Oudh and Benares division. Very little wood pulp is used as its cost (more than £15 to the ton at the mill) is very heavy item. The railway freight from port to mill is a considerable portion of this cost. The mills are beginning to experience difficulties in obtaining an adequate supply of old cordage (new hemp is too stiff and too expensive for the manufacture of paper) and also in securing the desired proportions of white and coloured rags.

STRIKING SUCCESS OF THE GROWTH OF SWADESHI IN THE WESTERN PRESIDENCY

I

There has been a steady increase in the output of Bombay yarns and piece-goods during the last few months. Of about 56½ million pounds of yarn produced in the whole of India in the month of June last year Bombay shared about 40 and she produced about 14½ millions of piece-goods during the same month. Since then the manufacture of grey and coloured piece-goods has shown considerable increase with hosiery. We hear that the David Sassoon Mills have attached a Calico-Printing branch to their Mills, and goods, though now inferior to imported articles, sell high enough. A Swadeshi Calico-Printing Company is also said to have been floated by Mr. Joshi, who is a practical calico-printer, though the work is not yet begun owing to want of sufficient capital and proper encouragement. Besides, new spinning and weaving companies such as the Sindh Spinning and Weaving Mills Limited and the Ramkrishna Weaving Mills are going to be or have been started in the Presidency of Bombay. It is also significant that the Bombay goods have got a ready consumption at home, as will be seen from the last "Lucky Day" sales of Bombay piece-goods. Messrs Luxmidas Maraji, sole Agents of Messrs Manickji Patit, Dinshaw Maneckji Patit, Bamanji Patit, Edward Mills, Century Mills and the textile Mills, sold 21,000 bales on the "Lucky Day," and nearly eight to ten thousand bales of goods manufactured by other mills were also sold.

Again, while the home-made piece-goods trade of Bombay is gaining ground day by day, her foreign piece-goods trade is losing its hold there, as will be evident from the following facts. It is a fact that 400 shops dealing in foreign piece-goods trade at Bombay booked only 3,500 packages on the auspicious day of Divali; while they ought to have booked at least 35,000 in the ordinary course of events with good rains during the season in the country. We further learn that the Port Trust Warehouses are choked with goods and new godowns should have to be constructed for fresh goods imported there. It now seems that 2 million sterling worth of goods is in stock and 1 million sterling is lost in depreciation. We further learn from a Bombay telegram dated the 8th December, 1908, and published in the daily papers that "the Bombay Native Piece-goods Merchants' Association have sent a petition to the Viceroy". They are a body formed for purposes (amongst others) of protecting, preserving mutual common interests of native piece-goods merchants of Bombay who chiefly deal in indenting piece-goods from different parts of Europe and America, and principally from Manchester, Lancashire and Glasgow. In the Association's memorial we read,—

"Owing to unforeseen causes over which the memorialists have no control, the state of foreign piece-goods markets has been most deplorable and disastrous for the last two years which have proved exceptionally bad for memorialists, so much so that the aggregate loss during the current year sustained by the members will be excessively enormous. The continuous fall in the prices of foreign piece-goods has baffled all attempts of piece-goods merchants to make both ends meet, and there is such a considerable, unprecedented collection of stock lying uncleared that almost all the ware-houses in Princes and Victoria Docks in the City of Bombay are full to the brim, not to speak of those lying in individual and private godowns. Comparatively there is very scanty demand for the same. Under these circumstances, they ask for remission of income-tax at least for the current and the next year."

II

This striking success for the textile Swadeshi naturally leads one to enquire whether, in the absence of any State-protection by means of tariff, such success would have been possible if voluntary protection by the people in the shape of industrial boycott did not in part at least act upon the situation. There are many, of course both among Indians and Anglo Indians, who will deny the fact and further argue against any sort of voluntary industrial boycott adopted by the people purely from motives of self-protection and call the same an economic fallacy. But whether this is so and whether protection of any kind (either by the people or by the Government of a country) is necessary for its weak, nascent industries shall have to be judged in the light of responsible opinions of both English and Continental Economists. In a previous issue of this magazine we quoted the opinion of a great German economist Mr List, whose National System of Economics has revolutionised the ideas of the world on the matter. We have also quoted other opinions of responsible thinkers on the subject in previous issues; but the latest support comes from an English economist still living Mr. Marshall, Professor of Economics in the University of Cambridge, who is a recognised authority and whose Principles of Economics is a standard book adopted by both English and Indian Universities. In his "Memorandum on the Fiscal Policy of International Trade" just published as a Parliamentary Paper, Professor Marshall, while discussing the recent remarkable industrial progress of Germany, makes the following noteworthy pronouncement:—

"MODERATION" AND MADNESS IN INDIAN POLITICS.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—I have read with great interest the summary of Mr. Gokhale's speech at Poona communicated by your Calcutta correspondent and published in the "Manchester Guardian" of July 28. There are two important issues raised in that speech which concern the school of Indian thought which I have the honour to be associated.

The first point is Mr. Gokhale's condemnation not only of all talk but even of all thought of independence as madness. This is a matter of opinion, and it would not have called for any comment if Mr. Gokhale had not brought it into support the present repressive policy of the Indian Government. In this same speech he said is reported by the Indian correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph," that the desire for freedom could only be met by Government "by stern and relentless repression." But, in the interests of all concerned, it is necessary that the nature of this madness should be clearly understood. Mr. Gokhale calls it madness. Lord Morley, with greater courtesy, calls it fantastic. But neither abuse nor repression will kill the spirit of freedom in India any more than the bullet and the prisonbar have been able to kill it in other parts of the world. This thought of independence is the natural result of the history of India for the last two hundred years. It is the fruit of English education in the classes. It is the fruit of British laws and methods of administration among the masses. The levelling down process of the British Government was bound to awaken a new spirit of self assertion and independence in the country. This spirit of independence first took shape in a religious revolt—in that large movement of the protest against sacerdotal authority which gave birth to the Brahmo Samaj in Bengal, the Prarthana Samaj in Bombay, and the Arya Samaj in the Punjab. It expressed itself also in the movement of social revolt which is in such favour with Mr. Gokhale himself. You cannot proclaim the gospel of freedom in one department of man's life and thought and counsel bondage in another. This freedom has even underlain the later movements of social and religious reaction in India. The earlier social and religious revolts had been too much influenced and controlled by foreign ideas and ideals. This reaction only represented the protest of the Indian race consciousness against the domination of European thought and culture. The desire for political freedom is only a part of this general awakening of the Indian consciousness. It is the cumulative result of the history of the last two hundred years. It is not a sporadic outburst, but a phase in a consistent course of social evolution. Will the spirit of freedom that has evolved out of such a long course of experience and thought be killed by either loyal or relentless repression?

The talk and thought of independence may, in Mr. Gokhale's opinion, be madness. But even he and his party are not free from the taint of this lunacy. Mr. Gokhale has subscribed to a political creed which proclaims colonial self government as its goal. But what practical difference is there between colonial self government and absolute independence? The school with which I am connected has refused to subscribe to this creed, not because colonial self government is not substantially the same as national autonomy, but because it is an absolutely false ideal, so far as India is concerned. The colonial relation is essentially a racial relation. This is a fundamental fact. There is no racial kinship between England and India. In the Boer colonies there has been some modification of this racial relation. The Boers are racially different from the British. But they are still a white race, of European stock. There is no colour line between the British and the Boer in south Africa or the French and the British in Canada. There is that impassable colour line between the British and the Indian. It is for this reason that the colonial ideal is a false ideal in India. We repudiate it for its untruth, otherwise it is substantially the same as national independence. Those who, like Mr. Gokhale, have proclaimed it as their ultimate ideal in India have either no conception of what the colonial ideal means and how it has developed or they do so simply as a ruse to allay the suspicions of their masters. Yet it is these very gentlemen who accuse others of cherishing a vague idea or seeking to save their skins by speaking of that which they do not believe to be true.

The thought of independence may be madness but the cry of self-government within the Empire on colonial lines is worse. It is dishonest. Colonial self-government means—(1) the right of self-taxation, (2) the right of self-legislation, (3) the right of self-administration. The colonies have a high tariff wall against all outsiders, including the mother country. Would not the right of self-taxation in India mean heavy protective duties against foreign manufactures, including the British? Would it not mean the practical exclusion of the Britishers from the Indian Civil Service? Would it not mean the removal of every form of special privileges enjoyed in India, under the existing laws by the British residents in that country. Would it not mean sure and swift retaliation on the British colonies whose people have now free access to our territories but who refuse us free admittance into their dominions? Nor would the situation be saved by any scheme of preferential relationship, which would mean a reciprocity that would enable the people of India to have the run of the whole Empire. Such preferential relationship would practically make the Empire our own for all commercial and industrial purposes. How Great Britain and her colonies especially, are likely to agree to such an arrangement is seen in the jealousy with which our people are viewed by them.

Colonial self-government is substantially the same as national independence. To the mere politician it is even preferable to national independence, for it gives all the advantages of independence without a part of its responsibility. It is, however, unthinkable in relation to India. England protects her colonies from outside foes. She is able to do so, first because of her naval supremacy and second because part of this burden and the heavier part is practically borne by India. To give a similar protection to a self-governing India without charging her for it is impossible for England or any other Power. As long as England has to protect India from outside enemies she must have the complete control of the purse there. Babu Surendranath might as well cry for the moon as for the control of the purse in India under British suzerainty. If England has ever to part with the power of the purse in India she will have also to ask India to arrange for her own defence. Great Britain may some day have India as a friend and ally, but never as a self-governing colony. British politicians understand all this. This is why Lord Morley refuses to entertain for a moment the idea of granting Parliamentary institutions to India. Mr. Gokhale also must know all; but yet he and his friends talk of colonial self-government. It only shows that the thought of independence, whether it is sane or insane, has taken such a strong hold of the articulate populations in India that even those who consider it mere madness have to make room for it in their own programme and propaganda, though under a different name. The madness, it is not all on our side.

There are clear indications even in this very speech that Mr. Gokhale, in his heart of hearts, cherishes this very madness. Your correspondent reports—

Mr. Gokhale describes all thought or talk of independence as mere madness. He pointed out that such ideas were bound to lead to violence and had as a matter of fact resulted in violence "To speak as if independence could be secured by peaceful means, through general resort to passive resistance, was ridiculous nonsense," and he gave it as his opinion that those who advocated passive resistance did so "to save their own skins."

The italics are mine. And a little careful analysis of this pronouncement would bring out I think, three distinct propositions—(1) independence cannot be secured by peaceful means, (2) the means that are capable of securing it are not at present at our disposal and (3) that therefore to talk and think of independence which is unattainable, is mere madness. And the logic of it all is that if Mr. Gokhale had a strong and powerful army at his command he would at once march it against the British and send his masters, bag and baggage, out of India. It is only his physical incapacity to do so that leads him to abandon all talk and thought of independence as mere madness. The most important issue raised by Mr. Gokhale, therefore is—can we or can we not organise the physical means necessary for securing our independence. Mr. Gokhale thinks we cannot. Lord Morley's "physical-force extremist" thinks that we can. This is all the difference between Mr. Gokhale and the bomb maker. The political philosophy of both is the same. They differ only in their estimates of the capacity of people to put that philosophy into practice. Like scepticism and credulity, the moderation of Mr. Gokhale and the madness of the bomb-maker are only two ends of the same stick.

There are at present three distinct groups of active politicians in India. The first group is represented by Mr. Gokhale; the second is the school which proclaims Syaraj, or national autonomy, as their ideal and lawful passive resistance as their methods; the third is represented by those who openly advocate resort to physical force, either openly from the safety of a foreign capital or secretly in India or England. The first and third are one, on Mr. Gokhale's own confession, in their want of faith in peaceful methods of securing national independence. The difference between these two in a moral and not an intellectual difference—it is the difference between prudence and recklessness. There is another difference also—one party has no faith in their people or their future, the other has it. It is thus only a question of time and chance whether or when these two parties shall coalesce. It will depend upon the success or failure of the third party. If they succeed, the first will join them; if they fail, they will have to join the first.

But the school of Syaraj stands apart. It desires independence. It believes in the possibility of securing it by peaceful means. It advocates passive resistance in which alone lies the possibility of peace. Deny the passive resister his lawful rights, crush him out, and the country will be thrown into the vortex of a revolution. For repression may kill us, but it will not kill the desire of the people of India to be a free nation among the free nations of the world.

It is not true that the talk or thought of independence and the pursuit of passive resistance have resulted in these acts of violence, which none more sincerely regret than the Syarajist passive resister. They are the results of official repression. They are the fruit of the attempt to deny to passive resistance its legitimate scope and play. Not lawful passive resistance but executive lawlessness is the parent of the bomb in Bengal—Yours, &c.,

BRAHMACHARYYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

English Edition, bound Rs. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon):—"Bramacharyya describes the life which Bramachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. I. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University:—"I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.
BHISMA ;
HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilized languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all, and the name of the great Patishah of the Kurus, Bhishma, is known to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS, to his nephews stand unequalled in the world. They are the greatest on the various phases of human duties, religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANSKRIT EPIQUE of the MAHABHARATA, the longest, the most difficult, the greatest and the richest of all other Puranas.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who even takes the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS, THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED, lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST, SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION: Each Part (per V. P. P.) is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis his great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. Reduced Rs. 1-8. Postage Extra.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Impatient Idealists.

The President of the Hugly Conference, in reference to the formal statement by Sj. Aurobindo Ghose of the adherence of the Nationalist party to the policy of self-help and passive resistance in spite of their concessions to the Moderate minority, advised the party of the future under the name of impatient idealists to wait. The reproach of idealism has always been brought against those who work with their eye on the future by the politicians wise in their own estimation who look only to the present. The reproach of impatience is levelled with equal ease and readiness against those who in great and critical times have the strength and skill to build with rapidity the foundations or the structure of the future. The advice to wait is valueless unless we know what it is that we have to wait for and why it is compulsory on us to put off the effort which might be made at the present. If we can progress quickly there must be adequate reasons given us for preferring to progress slowly or to stand still. We have not yet heard those adequate reasons. As far as we have gone, the only reason we have been able to find is that the fears and hesitations of our Moderate countrymen stand in our way. The whole Asiatic world is moving forward with enormous rapidity. In Persia in Turkey, in Japan the impatient idealists have by means suited to the conditions of the country effected the freedom and are now busy building up the dignity and strength of their motherland. Constitutional Government has been everywhere established or is being prepared for consciously and with a steady eye to its establishment in the immediate future. Even in Russia a Duma has been established with however restricted an electorate. Of all the great nations of the world India alone is bidden to wait. It is bidden by Lord Morley and Anglo-India to wait for ever. It is bidden by its own leaders to wait till the rulers are induced by prayers and petitions to concede a constitutional government and we have been told by those rulers when that will be never. We have been told not by conservative statesmen but by the chief teacher of Radicalism and democracy. Under the circumstances which is the more impractical and idealistic, the impatience of the Nationalist or the supine and trustful patience of the President of the Hugly Conference?

The Question of Fitness.

It is possible the President had his eye on the question of fitness or unfitness which is the stock sophistry of the opponents of progress. One of the delegates strangely enough selected the occasion of moving the colonial self-government resolution for airing this effete fallacy. The storm of disapprobation which his lapse evoked proves that in Bengal at least that superstition is dead in the minds of the people, and it is well, for no nation can live which at the bidding of foreigners consents to despise itself and distrust its capacities. We freely admit that no nation can be fit for liberty unless it is free, none can be wholly capable of self-government until it governs itself. We freely admit that if we were given self-government we should commit mistakes which we would have to rectify, as has been done even by nations which were old in the exercise of free and self-governing functions. We freely admit that the liberated nation would have to face many and most serious problems even as Turkey and Persia have to face such problems to-day, as Japan had to face them in the period of its own revolution. But to argue from these propositions to the refusal of self-government is to use a sophistry which can only impose on the minds of children. In the nineteenth century owing to a stupefying education we had contracted the truthfulness, naivety and incapacity to think for itself of a child's intellect and we allow a whole the sophisms which were administered to us. But we have thrown off that spell and if the impatient idealists of the Nationalist party had done nothing else for their country this would be sufficient justification for their existence that they have made a clean sweep of all this garbage and purified the intellect and the morale of the nation. It is enough if the capacity is there in the race and if we can show by our action that it is not dead. This we have shown by organised successful and national action under circumstances of unprecedented difficulty. If the success is now jeopardised, it is because of the temporary revival of the weaknesses of our nineteenth century politics and the desire to fall back into safe and easy methods in spite of their unfruitfulness. That is a weakness which is not shared by the whole nation, but is only temporarily suffered because a situation of unprecedented difficulty has been created in which it was not easy to see our way and in the silence that was unfortunately allowed to fall on the country and deepen the uncertainty, the forces of reaction found their opportunity. In times of difficulty to stop still for a long time is a cardinal error, the best way is to move slowly forward, warily watching each step but never faltering. Action solves the difficulties which action creates. Inaction can only paralyse and slay.

Public Disorder and Unfitness.

A favourite device of the opponents of progress is to point to the frequent ebullitions of tumult and excitement which have recently found their way into our political life and argue from them to our unfitness.

In the mouths of our own countrymen the use of this argument arises partly from political prejudice but still more from inexperience of political life and the unexamined acceptance of Anglo-Indian sophistry. But in the mouths of Englishmen this kind of language cannot be free from the charge of hypocrisy. They know well of the much worse things that are done in political life, in the west and accepted as an inevitable feature of party excitement. The rough horseplay of public meetings which is a familiar feature of excited times in England, would not be tolerated by the more self-disciplined Indian people. As for really serious disturbance the worst things of that kind which have happened in India occurred at Surat when S. J. Surendranath Banerji was refused a hearing and on the next day when Mr Tilak was threatened on the platform by the sticks and chairs of Surat loyalists and the Mahratta delegates charged and after a free fight cleared the platform. The refusal to hear a speaker by dint of continuous clamour, hisses and outcries is of such frequent occurrence in England that it would indeed be a strange argument which would infer from such occurrences the unfitness of the English race for self-government. We may instance the University meeting at which Mr Balfour was once refused a hearing and at the end of an inaudible speech two undergraduates dressed as girls danced up to the platform and gracefully offered the conservative statesman a garland of shoes which was smilingly accepted. As for the storming of platforms and turning out of the speakers and organisers, that also is a recognised and not altogether infrequent possibility of political life in England. A case remarkable for its sequel happened at Edinburgh when a faith-healer attempted to speak against Medicine and the undergraduates forced their way in, attacked and wounded the police, smashed all the chairs, hurled a ruined piano from the platform and hooted the discreetly absent orator in his hotel and challenged him to come out with his speech. On complaint the Chancellor of the University declared his approval of this riot and in a court of law the students were acquitted on the plea of justification. It may well be said that such a view of what is permissible in political life ought not to be introduced into India, but it is the worst hypocrisy for the citizens of a country where such things not only happen but are tolerated and sometimes approved by public opinion, to turn up the whites of their eyes at Indian disorderliness and argue from it to the unfitness of the race for democratic politics. And it must be remembered that worse things happen on the Continent, free fights occurring even in august legislatures, yet it has not been made an argument for the English people going over to the Continent to govern the unfit and inferior European races.

THE HUGHLY CONFERENCE.

The chances of politics are in reality the hidden guidance of a Power whose workings do not reveal themselves easily even to the most practised eye. It is difficult therefore to say whether the successful conclusion of the Provincial Conference at Hughly without the often threatened breach between the parties, will really result in the furtherance of the object for which the Nationalists consented to waive the reaffirmation of the policy formulated at Pabna and refrained from using the preponderance which the general sentiment of the great majority of the delegates gave them at Hughly. If things go by the counting of heads, as is the rule in democratic politics, the Nationalist sentiment commands the greater part of Bengal. But in leaders of recognised weight, established reputation and political standing the party is necessarily inferior to the Moderates, both because it is a younger force very recently emerged and because its leaders have been scattered by a repression which has aimed at the tall heads of the party. There is also a large body of sentiment in the Mofussil which is Nationalist at heart but does not always venture to be Nationalist in action because of the difficulties in the way of the Nationalist programme and the respect due to the elder leaders. On the other hand among the young men who command the future, Moderatism is dead and what takes its place is a Nationalism which loves rather to act than to think, because it has not yet accustomed itself to the atmosphere of strenuous political thought. In fact the spirit of Nationalism and its objects are becoming universal but its methods, though preferred, are not always adhered to and its thought has not everywhere penetrated below the surface.

The possibility or otherwise of united action was the governing thought throughout the Conference. The tendency to break to pieces was very prominent in the first day's proceedings and was fostered by certain incidents slight in themselves but each of which was in the existing state of feeling a quite possible pretext for disruption. It was from an observation of the proceedings of the first day that either party

ford its programme of action for the second. The Nationalist party intended to put forward a formal protest against any acceptance of the reforms in however slight a degree, to press the Pabna resolution on the Boycott and above all to insist on the Conference taking some definite step which would either materialize the chances of an United Congress or once for all show that union was impossible. The Moderate leaders came determined on four things, not to allow any resolution recognising general passive resistance, not to allow any resolution amounting to an absolute refusal of the Reforms, not to allow any resolutions debarring delegates from Bengal from joining the Lahore Convention in case of that body rejecting union and not to consent even to the bringing forward of any amendment or proposal of a pronounced nationalist character in the Conference. On all these points it was made quite evident that if the Nationalists pressed their points the Conference would be broken up by the secession of the Moderate leaders. In all these disputed matters, therefore, the Nationalists gave way and adhered only to their main point of securing some definite step in relation to the holding of an united Congress.

It is necessary to explain this action on the part of our party, for in his speech on the Boycott resolution S. J. Aurobindo Ghose purposely refrained from stating more than the bare fact in order that nothing he might say should lead to excitement or anything which could be an excuse for friction. It is not that the Nationalist party is not willing or able to stand by itself if that proves inevitable and seems the best course in the interests of Nationalism and the future of the country. But it has always been the ideal of the nationalists to make of the Congress a great and living body deliberative in the manner of free assemblies which consider from various points of view what is best for the country and decide by majority or, whenever possible, unanimously, the parties holding together not by identity of views but by one common aim and interest and the combined freedom and restraint of a constitution which provides for the free expression of opinion under fair and impartial rules. They seek also a centre for the country's strength which can give authority to a network of organisation systematising the work of the nation. They seek in other words a centre of deliberation and a centre of order and authority which can take charge of national progress. To seek this centre outside the long established body to which the nation has looked as the pivot of its political activities would have been a waste of material already half-prepared for the purpose. In attempting to convert this instrument to its proper uses they may have committed errors of over-eagerness and passionate impatience, the ordinary faults of a party of progress still young and energetic, but the errors on the other side were yet greater. The errors of life and progress are more exuberant and striking but less fatal than the errors of decay and reaction. However that be, in the attempt the instrument itself was broken, but it is capable of being mended if the past errors on both sides can be got rid of, and it is the duty of the Nationalist party to give a fair chance to the forces that make for the preservation of this old and honoured institution. This is the more incumbent on them as the sense of the country is in favour of an attempt to restore unity. A democratic party is bound to give the utmost weight to the general sense of the country in a matter of such primary importance.

It remains to be seen whether the great concessions made by the party will bear any fruit. The situation is not wholly encouraging. The position taken by the Moderate leaders that the Nationalists even if they are in a majority, must not try to enforce resolutions which travel beyond the limits of common agreement and unanimity and must allow resolutions to pass which are contrary to their principle and policy on pain of a Moderate secession may be tolerated for some time, but how long can a growing sentiment and ideal representing the future consent to be restrained within such iron limits? And if such be the basis of union proposed, it is obvious that the Congress will be an united Congress only in name and the attendance of the Nationalists perfunctory or useless.

If on the other hand the resolutions of the Congress are recognised as the opinion of the majority leaving the minority perfect freedom to bring in their own resolutions when they have converted the mass of public opinion to their views, the unity will be real and living. We were never in favour of shams. It is only righteousness that exalts a nation and righteousness means going straight; nothing can long endure which is based upon unreality and hollowness. If therefore there is any union it must be one which recognises that there are two parties in the country and that each has a right not only to exist but to make itself felt. This is a right we have not refused to the Moderate party when we were in the majority; if they refuse it to us, then the talk of unity must cease and Sir Pherozshah Mehta and Mr. Gokhale must have their way.

This is the position from the Nationalist point of view. We hope that the largeness of the sacrifice made will not, in view of the slightness of the chance in favour of which everything else was thrown overboard, create any dissatisfaction in the party. All shades of Nationalist opinion were represented at Hughly and they consented to be guided in the matter by Srijiut Aurobindo Ghose on whom the responsibility of leadership fell in the absence of older colleagues who have been temporarily or permanently removed from the field. The Nationalist party is in practical possession of the heart and mind of Bengal. It is strongly supported in other parts of India and controls Maharashtra. It is growing in strength, energy and wisdom. It surely inherits the future. Under such circumstances it can afford to wait.

THE IDEAL OF THE KSHATRIYA.

As for the past one thousand years the progressive ideal in India has been that of Brahminhood, so in the age upon which we are entering, the progressive ideal will be that of the Kshatriya or knight. Purity will be accepted as implicit and courage will be demanded. The Rajput will be the type of aspiration rather than the saint. The whole preoccupation of society will be with manliness and strength rather than with subtle shades of refinement and social prestige. Criticism will be on the great scale, and the small uneasiness of the village circle will be put on one side as fit only for old wives' gossip.

This will not mean that Hinduism will have changed its goal, but only that the path marked out for the individual will be different. Infinite are the paths that lead to a single centre. Then as now Mukti, Freedom, will be held the supreme good. But heroism, fearlessness and blazing energy will be the forms in which that mukti shall be worshipped. "What is manliness" said the Swami Vivekananda in a private talk, "It is to know instinctively ively what should be the glory of a man!"

The manly man knows when to strike. He also knows when to obey. There are times when disobedience is mere insubordination and unfitness for co-operation. There are times when obedience is cringing servitude. No man should be able to count on me to aid him in doing wrong! No man should be able shamelessly to speak of wrong in my presence. Even the Brahmin may have courage to strike the Kshatriya knows also the moment when it comes.

But fearlessness and being feared though essential to the knightly character, is only its foundation, not its crown. The last is found in the hatred of injustice, in the passion of pity and protection, in readiness instantly to give up life for the sake of the right. Herein lies the freedom of the Kshatriya, that he is free from fear for self. His own life is the pawn that he will cheerfully spend for the banner under which he fights. He will die with a shout of triumph. Nothing gloomy or resentful will mar the sun and serenity of his temper.

He is as generous as he is brave. He is as free from suspicion as from faint-heartedness. He knows nothing of jealousy, nothing of mean exultation. His greatest joy is in the glory of his comrades. His own modesty protects him from a degrading ambition. Honour is his dharm and the protection of the weak his mukti. Only in the hearts of the sons of kings can the companions of the avatars arise!

The true knight is unflinching in his austerity. Great generals sleep hard and eat sparingly. In armies the common soldiers are first served; their officers last. Even for games and sport the play of knighthood, the body has to be carefully trained. Ease and luxurious living soften the muscles and corrode the will. The Kshatriya keeps his snows like iron, his armour bright, and his spirit ever tense for the ideal. Even in sleep his hand is on the sword-hilt, and his ear open for the cry that may ring forth at any hour, "Awake! Arise! Fight ye, and cease not till victory is won!" Loyalty to leader and comrade, devotion to banner and cause; the love and expectation of greatness and truth in others; the pride that makes noble; the playfulness of him who can never be selfish and narrow, these are the qualities of the ideal knight.

The Kshatriya looks for strength, and not weakness, in woman. He seeks in her a comrade, not a toy. He reverences her soul, has regard to her highest aspirations, and never degrades her to feebleness or ineffectiveness because she is not man. Yet he worships at no false shrine, accepts no wire-laid subterfuge for greatness. Above all, he knows that woman, like man, has the right to self-sacrifice in some great cause. He looks to her for clear vision of the goal, and makes her free to suffer and be strong. He supports her highest will with his thought and knowledge. But he offers no homage to mere vanity or weakness. He meets her with no idle flattery or weak indulgence. Hand in hand, he treads with her the roadway of their common labour and common hope, in her eyes a noble sincerity, in his a tender reverence and unfaltering purpose. Highest of all the woman of the past were the satis who eagerly died for the sake of the beloved. Highest of those of the future will they be who live and die for the ideal itself, happy if in this they hold communion with their comrade's soul.

Lifted high above the maya of manhood and womanhood is the life of the ideal. Ideals are not accidents. They are the fruit of long tapas and of many lives. Human life is made great in proportion to their intensity. Few indeed are the souls who can live for an idea. In the age that is now dawning, the ideals of the past will not be cast aside. On the contrary, they will now, for the first time, find their true fulfilment. It is because of the great purity and sweetness of the Indian home that men can develop the strength and courage its defence requires. Only the perfect man is the true Kshatriya, and the perfect man is priest as well as knight.

Let us think reverently of the task that is before us. Never in history has there been a greater age than now. Nothing in the past is too high for the present. Sannyas was not greater than the public service. No form of Iswara could be higher than Bhumi Devi. This Devi we have to realise. Her worship we have to establish. And we may remember that in the form of Gandhari she sings still to the Duryodhanas of this day, as of another long ago—"Yato dharmastato jayah".

YOGA.

Man inherits the precious intellectual legacy of his predecessors and improves it. He takes up the work left to him in an unfinished condition by the pioneers before him. He digs. He cultivates. He sows. He reaps the rich and abundant harvest in the fields of Art, Science, Literature and Religion in which legions of workers have laboured for ages and centuries. Every stripling knows now-a-days, that the Earth move round the sun, and not Vice Versa, and that every apple gravitates towards its mother Earth. But he knows not how many, like Galileo have spent, nay sometimes lost their lives to demonstrate what now appear to be patent truths.

Thousands of great Intellectual Yogees have imperilled their precious lives and dived beneath the unfathomable waters of the Ocean of knowledge, to raise jewels that grace and ornament the minds of the enlightened men, women and children of to-day. Hundreds have worked unceasingly, day and night in the mass of Truth, with the help of the dim light of ancient research.

Some have only got the ingots out, others have worked the ingots into the finest filigree.

The Newtons and the Huxleys, the Roys and the Boses, and a host of others have revealed unto our ken the hidden workings of Nature, at her universal Laboratory, completely screened from the unseeing eye of the ignorant. The shining arrows in the quiver of Apollo that visit us from afar are to us now ordinary, humdrum sunlight, and not the weapons of the god Apollo, driving his glowing chariot of burning gold drawn by winged steeds. They have been caught and imprisoned in the Spectrum, and most mercilessly brought under the knife of scientific analysis.

This intellectual Yoga has opened the pages of Nature before us. Nature is no more a sybil's book to us. We have begun to study and understand her riddles. Her enigmas are as endless as the number of atoms in this beautiful universe we inhabit men like Newton, is but gathering pebbles on the Shores of the Infinite. Nevertheless, his knowledge is growing from more to more, as the waves of Time roll into eternity man is not an ephemeron. He is not for the hour for today but for eternity, endless Time. He is not perfect. He is eternally, marching towards progress. He is dragging himself up to the Heights evermore. From the highest steep, he finds a higher and a still higher one and goes on mounting and mounting. He begins the work of Yoga now, but it is an eternally unfolding process, a never ending progression,—an unceasing evolution.

Man is above the animal. Man can help on this evolution. He is not always fettered by bondage of the flesh. He can rise above himself. This is his highest privilege. In that is his glory. He is, therefore, Nature's last and best work of creative Art. He is not mere dust of the Earth and earthy. He can master the flesh. He survives the dissolution of the flesh. It is he, who, of all creatures, can unite his own faculties within himself, and can also unite with others, most beautifully and successfully, in intellectual operations, in order to be able to further the happiness of the greatest number, and thus fulfil his own object in life. Instinct and self are not all his good. He finds self in a better and higher measure in giving away self, for Truth, for humanity. He finds a higher Law in selflessness, in self-sacrifice than in self-seeking,—in self-preservation of viper,—the animal in man mis-called the Devil or Satan by the Jewish Puranas.

THE BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

Brother delegates, Ladies and gentlemen—

PREFATORY REMARKS.

Permit me, in the first instance, to thank you for the honour you have done me in electing me your President. But I must confess my utter unworthiness to fill the chair, specially when the Conference is being held at a time when the political atmosphere is surcharged with elements that may cause grave apprehension and anxiety. I feel my incapacity to discharge the heavy responsibility that lies on one who has to guide the deliberations of a representative assembly like this, which consists of members with political ideas of different shades. In discharging the duties which have devolved on me and in carrying through the proceedings of this Conference in a satisfactory manner, my only hope lies in your kind indulgence and forbearance and above all, in your hearty and earnest co-operation. Permit me again to thank you for the kind, warm and magnificent reception which you have been pleased to accord to me. The Reception Committee are entitled to my thanks for the very kind treatment I am receiving at their hands. I am not going to make this occasion an opportunity for indulging in rhetorical display, even if I were capable of doing so.

REAL OBJECT OF THE CONFERENCE.

But I shall confine myself to the exposition of the real object of the Conference, to relate facts and events to bring the national forces into a focus to concentrate them for the public good, to discuss matters of importance affecting the vital interests, rights and privileges of the people, to criticise measures adopted or acts done by Government, for carrying on the administration with the avowed object of giving protection to person and property and to make suggestions for co-operating with the Government in a way that good and affectionate relations may continue between the Ruling Power and the ruled and that happiness, prosperity and contentment may prevail throughout the Province.

PRESENT SITUATION IN BENGAL.

Bengal is now in a state of transition; it is passing through an eventful period and God alone knows what is in store for her in the future. Take an extensive view of Bengal in matters connected with general administration, politics, education, economics, industry, arts and every other matter interesting to all concerned; and what would you find? A stupendous change in the course of a few years. Unrest prevails throughout the Province; want of harmony exists among those whose common object is to serve their country owing to differences as to means and methods; political offences including murders and attempt at murder are being committed; state prosecutions against political offenders, real or supposed, are being conducted, in some cases successfully and in others unsuccessfully; deportation without trial or without even giving information as to the nature of the charges of men who are believed by my fellow countrymen to be perfectly innocent and who are loved and respected for their genuine patriotism; quartering of punitive police in some places; house searches are being made by the police according to their whims, drastic repressive legislative measures are being added to the Statute Book. On the other hand, the Government is shewing its magnanimity and liberality in seeking to introduce a scheme of reform which is intended and expected to give the children of the soil a large share in the Government of their motherland. My fellow countrymen, again imbued with new nationalistic ideas and awakened to a sense of duty are exerting themselves for the development of indigenous industries and arts and are seeking to impart education on national principles, without the help or Co-operation of Government. Mills, Factories, and workshops and Colleges and Schools on national basis have come into existence, indicating the awakening of a national life and a desire to develop the natural resources of the country. In thinking over this apparently conflicting and inconsistent state of things, one gets confused, nay, bewildered.

MATTERS FOR CONSIDERATION.

Naturally the question arises (1) what has brought about the present situation in Bengal? (2) what is the attitude of the Government? (3) What is the frame of the national mind (4) and what line of action should be now adopted?

WHAT HAS BROUGHT ABOUT THE PRESENT SITUATION IN BENGAL?

Political education was almost unknown in India till 1885, when the Indian National Congress was inaugurated in Bombay and a National Conference was held in Calcutta in 1885. The Indian National Congress was from its birth of a peripatetic nature and it went on holding its Sessions from one Province to another. The National Conference, in course of time became metamorphosed into the Provincial Conference and for the last few years it has been holding its Sessions in different Districts, undaunted unthwarted amidst opposition from various quarters, the two National Political Institutions went on doing their good work. In this connection I can't help mentioning the names of Mr. A. O. Hume, Sir William Wedderburn, late Mr. W. S. Caine and Sir Henry Cotton and Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji without whose co-operation, help, advice and self-sacrifice the movement could not have achieved the success which it has attained and for which they are entitled to our everlasting gratitude.

The Congress and the Conference succeeded in educating the Indians to a certain extent in politics, and the people of Bengal as it was before partition got impressed with the idea of unity for the formation of a nation, notwithstanding divergence in matters, social and religious—when the feeling in Bengal in its integral state was one of universal brotherhood a proposal was started in 1904 for the Partition of Bengal. That proposal was discussed in the Press and on the platform and thousands of meetings were held protesting against the Partition as was then proposed. It is not necessary to enter into further details about the excitement and agitation at the time for it is well known to you all. Then there was a lull for a time after which the Partition in its existing form was declared by the Government of Lord Curzon on the 16th October 1905. This form of Partition was conceived in secret, discussed and formulated in Camera, was never placed before the public for criticism or expression of opinion and was hurled down as a bolt from the blue against the emphatic protest and the declared wishes of the people against the originally proposed Partition which was of a less mischievous nature. Every one of you know that the Districts in the Raj Shahu Division were not included in the original proposal but they were also severed from Bengal Proper by the final order for Partition.

This contemptuous and utter disregard of public opinion, the dismembering of the Districts which were considered as component parts of one whole integral Province, the sense of separation amongst people who considered each other as brothers and above all, the introduction of racial feeling between Hindus and Mahomedans gave a rude shock to the people of Bengal, and the Bengalee population in both the Provinces and throughout India took to their heart the measure as inflicting a severe blow and causing injury of the first magnitude to their national cause and to their future progress and development. There are several factors for the present unrest. The contemptuous treatment of Indians by many Europeans, official and non-official; the unfriendly attitude of a powerful section of the Anglo-Indian Press believed to possess great influence with the Government disinclination shown by the Government to redeem the solemn pledges given by the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, the policy of the Government to exclude Indians from higher appointments under Government, the failure to get even handed justice as between Indians and Europeans, specially in Criminal cases had already given birth to a sense of insecurity and unrest and discontentment. The Partition demonstrating utter and contemptuous disregard for public opinion accentuated the feeling already generated and developed a deeper and far reaching sentiment and accelerated the growth of a feeling which is of an universal character and which has affected the classes as well as the masses. The subsequent events and repressive measures have intensified the unrest and the people have become discontented and unhappy and excited to a degree.

The reactionary policy of Lord Curzon gave a severe shock to Bengal and stimulated the national sentiment. Wide-spread excitement and unrest followed when a whole community was in a state of excitement, some were found to lose their heads; and it is the younger and the more impulsive section of the community who are most apt to be carried away by the surging tide of excitement. What has happened in Bengal has happened in every part of the world under similar conditions. This is an explanation and not a justification, for we deplore lawlessness and violence. We condemn it with all the emphasis at our command. Righteousness is the royal road to national re-generation. History says this through every line of her golden record and in the great work of national re-generation let us recognize this truth and scrupulously adhere to it. Let it however be said to the lasting credit of the Indian character that in the midst of all this excitement and unrest, the community as a whole remained steadfast to those peaceful and constitutional means which alone can bring us nearer to the goal of our aspiration. Self-government on colonial lines under British Government to our goal, and this goal is to be reached by perfectly legal and constitutional means. The new spirit which was evoked gave birth to the Bengal National Council of Education, the Bengal Technical Institute, the Cotton Mills, the factories for manufacturing articles of all sorts and the swadeshi movement, which are giving employment and affording means of livelihood, to millions of artisans and laborers.

SWADESHI BOYCOTT MOVEMENT.

As an influential section of the Anglo-Indian Press criticise in very hostile way, in bitter language and condemn in strong terms the Swadeshi Boycott movement and as Government is believed by some not to be with us, I deem it my duty to offer a few remarks and make a few observations in justification of the movement. It was the courage of despair emboldened my countrymen to adopt a resolution on the 7th August, 1905 in consequence of which the people at large have solemnly pledged themselves to use indigenous articles in preference to foreign articles of a similar nature, even at a sacrifice. This movement was never intended to be one of hostility towards Government or of hatred and racial antipathy and I venture to urge and I believe you will agree with me that as a matter of fact it is not so. To those whose mother tongue is English, the expression Boycott conveys with it an idea of hatred and I regret that the expression has been made use of in connection with our Swadeshi movement. What we really mean by Swadeshi is exclusion of Bideshi and use of Swadeshi articles as far as practicable. If you please I would omit the word "Boycott" in connection with the movement, the word has no charm in it and I may say in the words of the poet "what's in a name? The rose will scent as sweet if you call it by any other name" and call our movement simply swadeshi and this nomenclature, if adopted, would disarm our hostile critics and I feel confident we shall at once secure the sympathy and co-operation of the Government and without which a complete success of our scheme, within a short space of time can hardly be expected. "Boycott" in its fullest sense can never be accomplished. For instance we cannot boycott foreign machinery, books, scientific instruments and so on. You will no doubt have ample time to consider this question and come to a definite conclusion after mature deliberation.

At the outset when the movement was initiated it may be admitted there was picketing and in some instances perhaps excesses were committed. But the Swadeshi idea having permeated throughout the length and breadth of United Bengal and having filtrated down to the people of the lowest stratum, there is no longer any need of picketing or use of force, in fact the idea has taken such a deep root amongst the classes and the masses that there is hardly any need of external pressure; self interest is the dominating principle now and the ally of swadeshi.

Thousands and thousands of Mahomedan Jollas and Hindu Tantees have been saved from starvation since the swadeshi movement notwithstanding very high prices of staple food.

The movement is a protective measure and not one for attack or by way of retaliation. We have no hand in the Government fiscal system and we have no power to make a protective tariff, but as the human will carries its guiding principle within itself we have erected a protective wall by our own will forces. I do not wish to torment you with figures and statistics to demonstrate the effect of the Swadeshi movement resulting in an appreciable diminution in the imported cotton goods. The fact cannot be denied, but that portion of the Anglo-Indian Press which condemns the movement in a spirit of rancour and hatred and which predicted its failure and abortiveness, has now been laboring, with the assistance of inaccurate figures and illogical deductions, to show that the diminution is attributable to other factors and causes. There is no practical use in carrying on any discussion in this matter or making it a subject of controversy.

The economic effect and the potentiality of the movement are demonstrated by the rapid developments in industries and arts, the Mill industry, the Handloom industry, the Textile manufactures and various indigenous articles of daily use and of which it is unnecessary to give a detailed list all testifying to the development.

I may here profitably quote a passage from the well known speech of H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda—"If your Swadeshi movement has brought some relief to these obscure and unnoticed millions and tens of millions in India, as I have reason to believe it has done to a perceptible extent; if it has created a larger demand for their manufactures, widened the sphere of their labour and brought some light to their dark and cheerless homes then the movement, gentlemen, has my cordial sympathy."

The Government has again and again declared its intention to encourage the development of indigenous arts and industries, but unhappily it makes a distinction between true Swadeshi and false Swadeshi and treat the existing movement as not an honest or a true one. I regret and daresay you will join with me in expressing the same regret that the Government in its pronouncement has not thought it fit to point out the difference between the two kinds of Swadeshi. I venture to say the distinction is without a difference. I have no doubt and I hope in the very near future the Government will change its opinion—and if we make only a slight,—a nominal change in our nomenclature and attitude will give its unqualified support to our movement. The recent order for the use of indigenous articles in Government offices, sufficiently indicates how the wind is blowing.

POPLICE AND STATE PROSECUTIONS.

I have already referred to the unrest and the prevailing excitement. At this juncture the activity of the Police was at its zenith and some prosecutions were initiated at their instance of men of high and respectable position in society, men of culture and education, men, whose character was well known and who are in capable of committing offences and crimes which were imputed to them. Of course in the long run British Justice, in which we have so much faith asserted itself and innocent men after rotting in jail for a long time and undergoing the hardships and sufferings of a prisons life and discipline though only undertrial prisoners and after a great deal of mental anxiety and worry and after considerable expenses, were honorably acquitted. I need only refer by way of illustration to the Midnapore case, the Bighaty case, the Barrah case, I do not mention the Alipur case as it is subjudice.

The Government is no doubt primarily responsible for the unjustifiable prosecutions, but the real responsibility attaches to the Police and our complaint and grievance mainly lie in the fact that the Government places undue confidence in and reliance on Police reports. Police reform is absolutely necessary and the necessity has been long recognised by the Government, but there are very great difficulties in attaining success in this direction.

SEPARATION OF JUDICIAL AND EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS.

But the abuses of powers by the Police can be safeguarded by effecting separation of Judicial and Executive functions without further delay. The separation is not a controversial matter, it has long been conceded by different secretaries of state for India and Viceroy and Governors that it is a counsel of perfection. The recent state prosecutions emphasise the immediate separation of the two functions. The question has been discussed threadbare in the Press and from the platform. So further observations are unnecessary.

H. H. THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR ON BENGAL AND POLICE BILL.

It is very gratifying indeed to find that H. H. the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has not treated public opinion in respect of the Police Bill, now before the Bengal Legislative Council, with contempt and that the Bill has been recommended to the Select Committee and the opinion of the High Court will be invited. When approbation of laws by thoughtful sections of the community has been considered to be a factor in adopting any legislative measures, and when hasty legislation has been deprecated we may congratulate ourselves on having a Governor like Sir Edward Baker under whose control the administrative machinery might be expected to work satisfactorily.

DEPORTATIONS.

While considering these questions, I cannot help noting the deportations without trial or even without a notice of the charges against them—Bibus Aswin Kumar Dutt, Krishna Kumar Mitter and Subodh Chandra Mullick and others. We deplore their deportation, we sympathise with them and thank them for their misfortune and incarceration and while we are grieved at the attitude and action of the Government we consider the Police to be the root cause. In answer to certain questions put in Parliament by some member, he was told in reply that the deportations were the result of Police information, but after the expression of opinion as regards the Police evidence by his Lordship the present Chief Justice of Bengal in the Midnapore case—can the deportations based on Police information and reports be justified? On a repetition of the question in Parliament the Hon'ble Member putting the question was informed that there was credible information—whether credible information and Police information are synonymous or not the public have a right to form their own opinion.

REG III OF 1818.

The deportation of nine gentlemen is not necessary and is not justified. The aid of the fossilised Regulation III of 1818 was invoked and the deportees are rotting in Jail like ordinary prisoners. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for India have supported His Excellency the Viceroy in the exercise of his powers under the Regulation and in ordering deportation. The Regulation ought to have been considered obsolete, out of date, and repealed by implication, but it has been pronounced by the highest administrative authority that the Regulation is alive and operative.

If that be so, the Regulation ought to be relegated to abeyance. Referring to this Regulation of 1818 Lord Morley in one of his speeches in the house of Lords is reported to have said "What is the state of things as they appear to persons of authority and ample knowledge of India? Well, the anarchists are few but, on the other hand, they are apparently prepared to go any length and run any risk. An Indian friend of mine informs me that there is no fear of anything in the nature of a rising; but that if murders continue a general panic may arise and greatly increase the danger of the situation. We cannot hope that any machinery will completely stop the outrage at once but there is a growing indication that the native population itself is alarmed, and that the Government of India will have strong support from native public opinion. In substance, the view of the Government of India is that the position of our Government in India is as sound and well-founded as it has ever been. And I do not ignore the frightful risks involved in transferring what ought to be power under the law into the power of arbitrary personal discretion.

NEWS.

SERIOUS ALLEGATIONS AGAINST POLICE SUB-INSPECTORS

A great sensation has been caused in the city of Agrowington series of complaints that have been made by several Indian residents against a Sub-Inspector of Police named Gajadhar Pender. The complainants alleged that he severely assaulted them, made them bleed and kept them under wrongful confinement, etc. The district officers have taken prompt action in the matter and the Deputy Superintendent of Police was ordered to proceed to the spot and make enquiries. Meanwhile the complainants have filed cases in the Court of Mr. H. G. Haig, I. C. S., an officer of ripe experience and sound judgment who is holding an enquiry in open court. Another Sub-Inspector of Police belonging to a village police station is also under trial before Mr. Haig.

Mr. H. G. Haig, I. C. S., the Joint Magistrate, after holding a preliminary inquiry, has issued a summons against Sub-Inspector Gajadhar Pender. Two of the complainants are women. The case excites great interest throughout the city.

FATAL HUNTING ACCIDENT AT OOTACAMUND—

Mr. R. E. Lawley, son of their Excellencies Sir Arthur and Lady Lawley met with his death on a hunting field on Saturday afternoon at Ootacamund. He was out hunting and fell at a jump over a ditch at Chennund Chola. No one witnessed the accident. He was discovered with his mount on the top of him and his neck broken, and he must have lain there at least half an hour before he was discovered. Majors Hinge and Slater were on the Golf links and were summoned. His Excellency was also golfing at the time and the sad news was broken to him by Major Duff, the Military Secretary. The accident occurred at 4.30 and the body was conveyed to Government House by Majors Duff and Hinge at about 7.30 p. m. A stretcher of branches of trees and red coats was improvised to convey the body to the motor car. Her Excellency was not out hunting, but the Misses Lawley were out. Mr. Lawley had returned to Ootacamund from Secunderabad only on Thursday last and was cheerfully looking forward to training his horses for the point to point races. Universal sympathy is being expressed for their Excellencies Sir Arthur and Lady Lawley.

HOUSE SEARCH IN MANIKGANG—

The house of Babu Harendra Nath Dutt of the village Chabashpur was searched on the 6th September by the Inspector of Police. Nothing incriminating was found. It is not known in what connection the search was made. One of the owners of the house is, I hear, a Mukhtar practising in Rangpur.

C. was allowed to be let out on two bails of Rs. 2,500 and Rs. 3,000 respectively for the two counts. The offer has been declined.

DINAJPUR CONFERENCE.—

The third anniversary of the Dinajpur Association and District Conference was held yesterday. Eleven resolutions were passed. A new resolution on the desirability of setting on foot a movement with a view to get decisive legislation making the law of transferability of "Jote" rights and occupancy holdings free from custom and local usage and proposing an amendment of the law of ejectment by landlords from homestead lands was passed.

A RAJA'S LOYALTY.—

His Highness the Maharao Raja of Bundi has issued a notification calling upon his people to abstain from joining any seditious movement and expressing his contempt and hatred for such proceedings and desiring that all State servants and subjects should closely watch such disloyal and wicked persons and arrest those who may be found to have come to the State, to manufacture bombs and deal in explosive articles with a view to destroy life and property and those who will be able to arrest such persons will be duly rewarded by His Highness.

BOMBAY MILL CRISIS.—

The Bombay mill industry is passing through a crisis owing to the abnormal prices of cotton.

Eight thousand employees of the mills managed by Greaves cotton struck work to-day in consequence of the Agent's decision to close the mills three days in the week during September and close them entirely in October. The operatives to-day refused to go to work. They contended that closing the mills three days in the week would give them but starvation wages, that at the utmost the mills might be closed two days in the week or that they might be entirely closed from to-day, and they might be paid off. Through the intervention of Mr. Edwards, acting Police Commissioner, it was decided to  $\frac{1}{4}$  mil. from to-day and to pay off the workmen on the 10th instant.

TANVANDRUM POLICE CASE.—

One of the several cases, which are all offshoots of the recent riot, was torture by unlawful detention in custody of several people by policemen of whom several were tried, the result being five were convicted and sentenced to various terms of rigorous imprisonment, from two months' to six months' with fine. There are cases of torture and other offences by policemen also pending in which judgments will be pronounced shortly.

Aldred the printer of "Indian Sociologist," has obtained two sureties and has been released on bail.

KABUL NEWS.—

DR. GHAN'S SUCCESSOR.—

It is reported that Sardar Inayatullah Khan, with a cavalry and infantry escort, will make a prolonged tour in Gardez Khost and Kandahar. Sardar Nasrullah Khan is now busy attending to military matters and the general training of the Afghan Army.

The Amir has issued orders in all villages in the Jellalabad district to the effect that five rifles with free ammunition will be given to each Malik or headman in each village, which are to be utilised in giving assistance to officials in repressing disorder and killing or capturing offenders.

The Mullah Powindah and other leading Mullahs of Waziristan are said to be proceeding to Kabul.

The Lashkars of the Ali Khel Mamozai and Musazai tribesmen are now reported to be collecting in Tirah.

CALCUTTA HOUSES RAIDED.—

Five young Bengalis, it is alleged, of doubtful antecedents were arrested, on warrants on Thursday by the Calcutta Police. At an early hour on Thursday morning three simultaneous raids were made; one conducted by Inspector Mulchay at 15, Jorabagan Street, another by Inspector Jennings at 168, Ahiritollah Street, and the third by Inspector Ram Gopal Chuckerbutty at 92 Bechu Chatterjee's Street. A strict search was made at each house and as a result, five Bengalis, the names of whom, the police refuse to disclose, were arrested and lodged in jail on charges in connection with the Faridpur dacoity of a few weeks ago. Several bundles of correspondence and other papers were seized, but the contents of these are not at present known.

A SHERIFF AND MEETING.—

The Government of Bombay has issued the following notice:—The Government regret if any personal inconvenience has been caused by the cancellation of of the Sheriff's notice, convening a public meeting, in regard to the question of the position of Indians in the Transvaal. They have, of course, no objection to the holding of a meeting for this purpose. Their views and those of the Government of India and of the Secretary of state are known; but on, the other hand, they consider that the Sheriff as a Government officer should summon and preside over no meetings except such as are non-controversial, non-political, and intended only to give general expression to a universal public feeling. In the present case these conditions are not fulfilled.

"SWARAJ" PROSCRIBED.—

In the Gazette (Commerce and Industry Department), appears the following notification.—

Bringing by sea or land into British India the magazine Swaraj or the Indian Nationalist is prohibited.—

GANESH MODAK'S CASE.—

The Chief Magistrate, gave his decision in the case in which Ganesh Modak of the Vartman Agency stood charged with disseminating sedition. In that he distributed or sold copies of the July number of the "Swaraj," edited by Bepin Chandra Pal in London. It is alleged to be containing seditious matter. His Worship in the course of judgment said that there was no doubt that the article in question was calculated to excite disaffection. The evidence also showed that the accused was not an ordinary agent but the sole agent of the journal in India. It is also to be inferred from the evidence that the accused knew the contents of the journal. His Worship convicted the accused and sentenced him to one month's simple imprisonment.

BOMBAY MILL HANDS.—

Since the closing of the mills in the city, a large number of mill operatives have been left adrift. There has been a panic among boarding-house keepers, grain merchants and landlords, who have in some cases ceased to give credit to unemployed mill hands. Owing to the closing, since last Sunday, of the mills owned by the late Dwarkadas Dharamsey matters have grown still worse.

FACING FACTS. —

In the same number of the Nineteenth Century and After in which Sir Bampfylde Fuller has shown cause why the demands of the educated Indians should not be listened to, Sir Harry Johnstone has given reasons why they should be listened to. One seldom comes across such refreshing frankness in the general run of contributions on Indian affairs to the British periodical literature, especially from men of distinctly conservative instincts like Sir Harry Johnstone. The notable communication under notice is the more remarkable for this fact. That Sir Harry Johnstone is not a man of Radical principles will be evident from the fact that he cannot sufficiently condemn the missionaries of the Protestant Churches who sowed the "dragon's teeth of education" among the natives of India and Africa. But he does not hold that the original sin would be expiated by committing the further indiscretion of trying to suppress the irresistible crop of yellow, brown and black men asking as a consequence of being as well-educated as the average Englishman, "for the same right to have a voice in the government of their own countries and the disposal of the money raised by their own taxation." The "holding down" policy if it was to be adopted at all as the watchword of the British Empire, should have been nailed to the mast in 1792, before the first educating Missionaries went out to British India. It is now too late to talk of checking the tide that has set in and is lifting the whole continent, as it were, out of itself. The safest course for Imperial England is now to face the facts. The only solution of the problem is to "face, digest and gradually provide for and admit the demands of the black, brown and yellow peoples under our sway for a voice in their own destiny." The die is cast, there is now no withdrawing from the game, even if its results do not exactly suit your wishes.

It is not the fault of the "natives" that affairs in India have taken an inconvenient turn, says Sir Harry Johnstone. It is Englishmen the selves who have created the "Babu" class, who have called into being minds very like their own; personalities who having studied the lessons of European history, having followed the processes by which the Catholics of the United Kingdom, the Jews, the laboring classes (Chartists) have become emancipated and franchised, have very naturally drawn the deduction that their turn must be at hand; that if a native of India, of no matter what religion or race, paid taxes and obeyed the law, he should have some vote, some power, of control over the Government that taxed him. Sir Harry Johnstone, by the way, forgets the important fact that it was not in the hands of "hold down" Imperialists to hold back the march of Time or the course of civilisation, and that the leaven that is working in other parts of Asia has not had its origin solely in the Indian Universities. The great question is not of the responsibility of this or that people for the evolution of India towards a necessary condition of things demanded by the course of Time and civilisation, but of the unavoidable necessity for those who are at the head of affairs to advance with the times. And Sir Harry Johnstone, we are glad to see, is very explicit on this point.

The writer has given a fine example of the proverbial British love for justice and fairly in taking a strikingly impartial view of things in India in spite of his predominant Conservative instincts which it has at times vainly tried to suppress. His views regarding the genesis of the present situation in India are particularly noteworthy, and will be an eye-opener to the readers of the Nineteenth Century and After whose hospitable pages have lately been specially devoted to the misrepresentation of India and its affairs. For example:

The natives have no direct voice in the government of their own country, no say as to the amount of taxation which shall be imposed or the manner in which the taxes shall be spent. Neither (it might be said) do the Europeans born or settled in those countries have anything of the kind: but then they are very few in number and no important European interest is unrepresented on the councils of the Viceroy and of the great Indian Governments, while the English Press is practically unfettered, provided it expresses its opinions in the English Language. It can deliver itself of the sharpest criticism of Government and of personalities which just stop short of libel (if it chooses) without incurring penalties. I do not say that the native Press is not free to descant on projected laws and on the actions of officials, but it must accomplish this task so guardedly that its condition is no freer than the Press of Russia as applied to the same purposes.

Sir Harry Johnstone is an Englishman, not professing Radical principles. We give his views as they are. As an additional cause of unrest, he adds to "this felt want of a franchise" the "often tactless and even tyrannical behavior of a small proportion of British in India":

I write these words advisedly and after some personal experience of India. It is better that we should face facts. The Indian Civil Service consists for the most part of the best type of Englishman, Irishman, or Scotchman which could be sent out to India to govern and administer... But some of the lesser officials, perhaps of the unconvenanted service-magistrates, justices of the peace, soldiers employed in civilian posts—do not always attain the high standard of excellence. It is known to me as a fact that of late years there have been a sufficient number of harsh and even savage judgments—excessive terms of imprisonment, for example, for relatively small crimes—imposed by hot-tempered urban magistrates, to have caused an extremely bitter feeling to reverberate through Bengal, the North-West Provinces, and the Bombay Presidency. I know personally several Englishmen in India who yield to no one in their loyalty to the Empire or their enthusiasm for that Empire, but who have felt compelled to draw public attention, through the Press or by personal intervention, to the injustice of certain sentences, and have even succeeded in getting one or two of them revised or reversed. Of course, in consequence, they—the "real" Imperialists—were attacked by the Jingo section in India—the "real" little Englishers—and their lives were made intolerable, perhaps even their business affected and damaged because they had attempted to stand up against errors of justice in the same way in which magistrates are pilloried in the columns of "Truth." Yet I make bold to say that men of this description have done more to mitigate the present feeling of unrest in India than their fellow countrymen of the east of thought satirised by Bernard Shaw in a recent prohibited play.

The solution of the problem, according to the writer, lies, not in a futile bellowing over what should have been but in looking the present and the future in the face, and in the recognition of the fact that there must be "give" and "take" in any earnest attempt to advance with the times, and "gradually to pave the way, from precedent to precedent, towards a more perfectly governed Empire."—The Panjabee.

S. N. BASU,

FORWARD OR BACKWARD ?

Of late English statesmen both in India and in England have been betraying symptoms of impatience which is not consistent with sound statesmanship. They have succumbed to the angry passions of the hour—deluded, on the one hand, by the utterances of the bureaucracy alarmed at the prospect of change and, on the other, by the clamour of a section of their countrymen whose vested interests the changed circumstances in India tend to injure. And they are viewing the trend of events through a somewhat distorting haze.

The question of the conversion of the strong, stolid, practical, invincible Britisher into an emotional, hysterical, excitable and panic-stricken race need not trouble us. What we are concerned with is the attitude of the Englishman towards present-day India struggling to ameliorate her condition.

It was, we believe, the Times which—after describing in detail imaginary methods of spreading sedition in India—first brandished the sword, and advanced the effete and foolish opinion that England had conquered India by the sword and would keep it by the sword. The Times when it made this ridiculous assertion was evidently ignorant of the real history of the conquest of India and oblivious of the truth that you cannot conquer the heart of a people by fire and steel, and—as an Englishman said more than half a century back, “fleshly arms, and the instruments of war, are but a fragile tenure, and ‘soon to nothing brought,’ ‘when opposed to the interests and the will of an enlightened people.’” The English in India are not numerically stronger than the people of the country, and their position in India must depend not on their military strength, but on the willingness of the people themselves to maintain them in that position of lofty eminence. This has been admitted by all sensible Englishmen who have studied the country and its problems. “The huge mammal, India’s symbol, is a docile beast, and may be ridden by a child. He is sensible, temperate, and easily attached.” But “When he is angered in earnest, his vast bulk alone makes him dangerous, and puts it beyond the strength of the strongest to guide him or control.” After the Times came the Hon. Mr. Baker. During the discussion on the Bill for the Prevention of Seditious Meetings in the Council of the Governor General of India Dr. Rash Behari Ghose called it a “Bill for the Prevention of Seditious Meetings and the Promotion of Secret Sedition.” The Indian members of the Council were of opinion that the measures would drive discontent underground and thereby enhance the chance of volcanic eruptions in the future. The then Finance Member referred to these apprehensions, and openly said, “I am not in the least afraid of driving sedition underground.” This was certainly a bold assertion and not exactly statesmanlike.

But what one could excuse in the Hon. Mr. Baker, the Finance Member—one cannot neglect in Sir Edward Baker, the Lieutenant-Governor of the most advanced province. Yet in spite of the fact that the London Police—an abler and a more scrupulous body than the Police in India—decline to accept the assertion made by stray individuals that the recent murders in London were a part of a huge conspiracy to murder Englishmen without discrimination between the innocent and the guilty, Sir Edward has threatened to punish Bengal for the action of Modan Lal Dingra. He has threatened to bring a solution which “will not be peaceful” nor “painless,” “and there will be little room at that time for a nice discrimination between the innocent and the guilty.” Such a method is nothing if not in direct contravention to the first principles and best traditions of British justice which glories in taking especial care to see that the innocent do not suffer for the guilty. Moreover what does this threat signify? As for the million-patient and law-abiding—they do not deserve it. As for stray fanatics like Dingra who kill innocent Englishmen, and one hanged they are not afraid of any punishment.

Then there are the thousands in which some Indians—renowned more for their religiousness and scrupulous honesty than for their political views—have been condemned unheard. They have been denied the right of an open trial. And though we have been told that the evidence against them was carefully considered by responsible officers, that evidence must have been in the first instance—secured by the Police so much discredited in the law courts of Bengal, Burma, Madras, the Punjab, and the United Provinces. And unless and until the evidence which can bear scrutiny is adduced the people cannot be blamed if they hesitate to be convinced. Then again the condition of confinement is not, in the case of all of them, comfortable. Such, at least, has been the assertion of Srijut Sukumar Mitra who had an interview with his father Srijut Krishna Kumar Mitra at Agra, and saw with his own eyes the arrangements that the Government had made for deportees—a gentleman of position and prominence. And—what is more—the publication of the letter Sukumar had addressed to the Government on the subject, in the papers seems to have infuriated the responsible authorities so much that they have threatened to deprive the deportees of the doubtful privilege of communicating with their relatives by means of letters—doubtful as every letter is examined by officers before despatch. The publication of such letters is likely to provoke inconvenient and embarrassing questions in the British Parliament, and reveal the real nature of the treatment that these deportees are receiving; but the manner and method of precluding the possibility of their publication—if the rumour can be taken as true—are hardly commendable. It seems English administrators have to be reminded what every English school-boy knows:—

"It is excellent

To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous

To use it like a giant,"

But if the conduct of Anglo-India can be attributed in part to close proximity to the scene of rapid change in India, and—as John Pitt said in 1893—"In part to the heat of the country" which alters European temper—what excuse is there for those who look at Indian affairs through "loopholes of retreat"? Yet they—even they—have not been able to avoid the contagion. Lord Morley has taken Mr. Makerness's Bill about deportations in India as a vote of censure—as if even Englishmen have not the right to criticise the actions of one who has certainly "shelved in certain Indian transactions the principles of a lifetime," and, thereby, lost the little credit he had accumulated in the bank of public opinion.

The other day Lord Morley spoke at Oxford on the situation in India with that garulity which usually characterises post-prandial orations and old age. A large portion of this farrago of fact and fiction was occupied by the deportations—a subject which has embarrassed their author so much. And he said:—"It is said of a man who is arrested, not on a charge, not on a conviction of a Court, 'Oh, he ought not to be harshly treated.' He is not harshly treated.' If he is one of the nine deported men, he is not put into contact with criminal persons. His family are looked after. He subsists under conditions which are to an Indian perfectly comfortable to his social position, and to the ordinary comforts and convenience of his life." India though within the range of Lord Morley's genius, lies outside the area of his knowledge. And it is—to quote his own words—"a masterpiece of melancholy meanness" to consider Indians members of an inferior race simply because they happen to have been conquered by a people whose ancestors were naked barbarians when their ancestors had elaborated a civilisation which has successfully withstood the corrosive wear and tear of time. Is it much that these deported gentlemen are not herded together with common criminals? The conditions under which they have to live leave much to be desired. And this has been shown in Srijut Sukumar Mitra's letter as also in the letter written by a deportee from Rawalpindi. The usual style of living of some of these deportees was costlier and their standard of comfort higher than those of Lord Morley who has in the eve of his life turn his back upon himself, and trampled under foot the principles he had preached all his life.

Last—but not least—comes the assertion of the Master of Elibank whom the wine of new-got power seems to have turned giddy. Speaking at Woodford the other day he said, "that Lord Morley would do his duty, undeterred by criticism. He would deal drastically with those who were exciting disloyalty while themselves keeping in the background. It were necessary for the safety of the Empire that those rebellious agitations and waves of feeling should not be permitted to attain maturity." As if feeling can be muzzled, and thought killed.

These assertions and these threats, as we have already said, are not consistent with sound statesmanship. And English statesmen seem to have forgotten what statesmen should not allow sentiments to tinge the colourless light in which their understanding moves. But then—as Burke has put it—"I have known merchants with the sentiments and abilities and of great statesmen; and I have seen persons in the rank of statesmen with the conceptions and character of pedlars." Now whither is England advancing—forward or backward?

BRAHMACHYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

English Edition, bound Rs. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras;—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congressional conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffa, Ceylon):—"Bramacharyya describes the life which Bramachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

AGREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilised languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world:—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties,—religious, social political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI PARVAM of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvas.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS—THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDIEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part [per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis is his great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishanda. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy. The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstract Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the reader of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. Reduced Rs. 1-8. Postage Extra.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Two Programmes.

There could hardly be a more striking contrast than the pronounced dissimilarity between the resolutions passed at the Hughly Provincial Conference under the pressure of the Moderate leaders' threat to dissociate themselves from the proceedings if the Pabna resolutions were reaffirmed and the resolutions passed at the enthusiastic and successful District Conference held last Saturday and Sunday in the Surma Valley. They are severally the re-affirmation of two different programmes, the advanced Moderate programme of a section of opinion in West Bengal supported by Faridpur in the East and a sprinkling of individuals in some of the large towns and the Nationalist programme as advanced by East Bengal and a great section of opinion in the West. The advanced Moderate programme contemplates Colonial self-government as a distant and ultimate goal, advocates commercial boycott of foreign goods, contemplates National education as an educational experiment supported practically by some, in theory only by others, and regards self-help as a pendant and subordinate to so-called constitutional agitation, in other words, the acceptance of everything the Government does subject to protest, criticism and, when necessary, invective. This is the theory of co-operation plus opposition, opposition in words, co-operation in practice. It has to be seen how far the reassertion of this policy, for some time discredited, will go in its results and what is the underlying motive of the Moderate leaders in insisting on the reassertion at this particular moment when the Partition, Deportations, coercive laws are in full operation and not a single one of our grievances redressed. The Nationalist programme asserts autonomy as the right of all nations, advocates the use of every legitimate and peaceful means towards its establishment whether swift or gradual, and especially favours the use of self-help to train and organize the nation for self-government and of passive resistance to confirm and defend the measures of self-help and to bring pressure on the bureaucracy to yield a substantial measure of self-government. The defect of the Nationalist party is not in energy or organisation, for it has a superior capacity in these respects to its opponents, but in means and the present weight of its personalities. It is only by effective, persistent and organized work with what means it has at its disposal that the party can make up for this inferiority. That organization must now be taken definitely in hand. It is doubtful whether the frail hope of an United Congress will ever take shape as a materialised fact, and even if it does, it is likely to be under such circumstances that the Nationalists would be ill-advised to put their main energy into Congress work until they have so all pervading and solid a strength in the country as to make it possible for them to assert themselves without any peril to the united progress of the nation. They must vindicate the superiority of their programme by its effectual execution and result, leaving the Moderates for the present to the raptures of their rapprochement with the bureaucracy.

The Reforms.

An argument advanced in favour of the Reforms is that, however ineffectual and illusory the expansion of the Legislative Councils may be—and the illusory nature of that expansion cannot be seriously denied,—still there is included in the Reform Scheme a measure of local self-government generous, complete and effective, which is well worth acceptance. We are by no means certain how far a substantial measure of local self-government is really contemplated by the Government. It was originally proposed, we believe, to four local self-governing bodies elected by the people and uncontrolled by any official chairman. But many things were originally proposed which comto have little chance of taking shape as ultimate actualities. We are not aware how far the measure will be carried out, what limitation may be put upon it or whether the control of the official chairman will not be replaced by a higher and more distant but eventually more effective control. We shall have to be thoroughly assured on these points before we can allow that any measure of local self-government included in the measure can outweigh the nugatory character of the main change in the instruments of government. Unless the local self-government is complete and ungrudging, it may be a convenient measure and to a slight extent strengthen the educated class in the mofussils, but it cannot be a vital measure or even one of the first importance among changes of administrative structure. In any case it cannot outweigh, however full it may be, the disastrous character of the principle of separate electorates introduced by Lord Morley, intentionally or unintentionally, as the thin end of a wedge which, when driven well home, will break our growing nationality into a hundred jarring pieces. Only by standing aloof from the new councils can this destruction be avoided. This is the point on which we feel bound to lay stress again and again because it is the one vital and effective thing in the new measure, all the rest is mere frippery and meaningless decoration. It would be a poor statesmanship which bought a small and temporary gain by throwing away the future of the nation and the hope of an united India, and posterity will have reason to curse the memory of any popular leader who for the sake either of more gilt on the "gilded shams" or even for a real measure of local self-government, induces the nation to accept the reforms with the separate electorate and special privileges for one community as an essential feature.

The Limitations of the Act.

There is another point in this connection which destroys the little value that might possibly have attached to the argument from Lord Morley's intentions about local self-government. One peruses the Act in vain for a guarantee of any measure of reform which may be conceded under it to the people except the number of elected and nominated members in the Councils. Every thing else, literally everything else, is left to the discretion of Anglo-Indian officialdom. No doubt the present Secretary of State will have the ultimate decision as to the rules of election, nomination, formation of electorates, acceptance or rejection by the Government of elected members, veto, division, interpellation etc., and he may decide to put the felt on thickly and copiously. But even if this be done, not one of these things will be assured to us, not one of them but may be reversed by subsequent Viceroys and Secretaries of State without infringing, the meagre provisions of this Act. As for local self-government we fail to find any guarantee either for its introduction or, if introduced,—as, no doubt, Lord Morley will have some slight respect even yet for his own reputation,—for its retention in the future. What is to prevent a future Alexander Mackenzie in the Viceregal seat from so altering any measure that may be given as to render it nugatory and what is to prevent a future Curzon in the India Office from confirming this step to rearwards? So far as we have been able to find, nothing at all. We are just where we were before, with concessions granted by arbitrary condescension which may be withdrawn at any moment by arbitrary arrogance. Well may Lord Morley say that this is not a measure of self-government and, if he thought it were, he would not concede the measure. The nationalist party is not opposed to all acceptance of reform; it would welcome and support a measure which would really concede even a minimum of control and provide a means for future expansion while perpetually guaranteeing the small amount conceded; but a measure by which no control is given, no step taken is guaranteed as to permanence and no provision is made for future expansion is one which no thinking man would care to have even apart from other defects, and no practical politician will look at for a moment when coupled with provisions disastrous to the future of the nation.

Shall we accept the Partition?

This may sound a startling proposition to a nation which is perpetually reaffirming its decision never to accept the settled fact. But it rises definitely upon the question of accepting the reforms. We cannot conceal from ourselves the staringly patent fact that if we accept the reforms, we accept the Partition. The new changes are partly meant to confirm the division which every English statesman declares it to be essential to British prestige to perpetuate, and if the older leaders of West Bengal accept the reforms and stand for Sir Edward Baker's Council or allow their followers to stand for it, the sooner the partition resolution is deleted from the proceedings of Provincial and District conferences and the celebration of the 16th October discontinued, the better for our national honesty and sincerity. If the West Bengal leaders, who under the pressure of public opinion gave up their seats on the old Council and the idea of becoming Honourables in future, join the reformed Council in Calcutta, there is nothing to prevent the East Bengal leaders from joining Sir Lancelot Hare's Council in the capital of the New Province. If that happens, where will the Anti-Partition agitation be and where the solemn vow of unity? To solemnly meet once a year and declare that we will never, never accept what we have accepted, would be a farce too hypocritical for the conscience of the most cynical or the intelligence of the most deluded to tolerate. Any revival of the fiction that it is East Bengal which has been partitioned from West Bengal and therefore there is no obligation on the West Bengal leaders to boycott the Councils while the East Bengal leaders are so bound, will not be suffered. But the Moderates have definitely and rigidly excluded political boycott from their programme; yet what is the abstention from the Councils but a political boycott? If they carry this exclusion to its logical result and accept the reformed Councils, that is the end of the Anti-Partition agitation. Lord Morley's policy will be entirely successful and Mr Gokhale may still more loudly acclaim him as the saviour of India from a state of anarchy and chaos.

THE PROCESS OF EVOLUTION.

The end of a stage of evolution is usually marked by a powerful re-ascendence of all that has to go out of the evolution. It is a principle of Nature that in order to get rid of any powerful tendency or deep-seated association in humanity, whether in the mass or in the individual, it has first to be exhausted by bhoga or enjoyment, afterwards to be dominated and weakened by nigraha or control and, finally, when it is weak, to be got rid of by sanyama, rejection or self-dissociation. The difference between nigraha and sanyama is that in the first process there is a violent struggle to put down coerce and, if possible, crush the tendency, the reality of which is not questioned, but in the second process it is envisaged as a dead or dying force, its occasional return marked with disgust, then with impatience, finally with indifference as a mere ghost, vestige or faint echo of that which was once real but is now void of significance. Such a return is part of the process of Nature for getting rid of this undesirable and disappearing quantity.

Sanyama is unseasonable and would be fruitless when a force, quality or tendency is in its infancy or vigour, before it has had the enjoyment and full activity which is its due. When once a thing is born it must have its youth, growth, enjoyment, life and final decay and death; when once an impetus has been given by Prakriti to her creation, she insists that the velocity shall spend itself by natural exhaustion before it shall cease. To arrest the growth or speed unseasonably by force is nigraha, which can be effective for a time but not in perpetuity. It is said in the Gita that all things are ruled by their nature, to their nature they return and nigraha or repression is fruitless. What happens then is that the thing untimely slain by violence is not really dead, but withdraws for a time into the Prakriti which sent it forth, gathers an immense force and returns with extraordinary violence ravening for the rightful enjoyment which it was denied. We see this in the attempts we make to get rid of our evil sankaras or associations when we first tread the path of Yoga. If anger is a powerful element in our nature, we may put it down for a time by sheer force and call it self-control, but eventually unsatisfied Nature will get the better of us and the passion return upon us with astonishing force at an unexpected moment. There are only two ways by which we can effectively get the better of the passion which seeks to enslave us. One is by substitution, replacing it whenever it rises by the opposite quality, anger by thoughts of forgiveness, love or forbearance, lust by meditation on purity, pride by thoughts of humility and our own defects or nothingness; this is the method of Rajayoga, but it is a difficult, slow and uncertain method; for both the ancient traditions and the modern experience of Yoga show that men who had attained for long years the highest self-mastery have been suddenly surprised by a violent return of the thing they thought dead or for ever subject. Still this substitution, slow though it be is one of the commonest methods of Nature and it is largely by this means, often unconsciously or half consciously used, that the character of a man changes and develops from life to life or even in the bounds of a single lifetime. It does not destroy things in their seed and the seed which is not reduced to ashes by Yoga is always capable of sprouting again and growing into the complete and mighty tree. The second method is to give bhoga or enjoyment to the passion so as to get rid of it quickly. When it is satiated and sarfeited by excessive enjoyment, it becomes weak and spent and a reaction ensues which establishes for a time the opposite force, tendency or quality. If that moment is seized by the Yogin for nigraha, the nigraha so repeated at every suitable opportunity becomes so far effective as to reduce the strength and vitality of the vritti sufficiently for the application of the final Sanyama. This method of enjoyment and reaction is also a favourite and universal method of Nature, but it is never complete in itself and, if applied to permanent forces or qualities, tends to establish a saw of opposite tendencies, extremely useful to the operations of Prakriti but from the point of view of self-mastery useless and inconclusive. It is only when this method is followed up by the use of sanyama that it becomes effective. The Yogin regards the vritti merely as a play of Nature with which he is not concerned and of which he is merely the spectator;

the anger, lust or pride is not his, it is the universal Mother's and she works it and stills it for her own purposes. When, however, the vritti is strong, mastering and unspent, this attitude cannot be maintained in sincerity and to try to hold it intellectually without sincerely feeling it is mithyachara, false discipline or hypocrisy. It is only when it is somewhat exhausted by repeated enjoyment and coercion that Prakriti or Nature at the command of the soul or Purusha can really deal with her own creation. She deals with it first by vainagya in its crudest form of disgust, but this is too violent a feeling to be permanent; yet it leaves its mark behind in a deep-seated wish to be rid of its cause, which survives the return and temporary reign of the passion. Afterwards its return is viewed with impatience but without any acute feeling of intolerance. Finally supreme indifference or udasinata is gained and the final going out of the tendency by the ordinary process of Nature is watched in the true spirit of the sanyami who has the knowledge that he is the witnessing soul and has only to dissociate himself from a phenomenon for it to cease. The highest stage leads either to mukti in the form of laya or disappearance, the vritti vanishing altogether and for good, or else in another kind of freedom when the Soul knows that it is God's lila and leaves it to Him whether He shall throw out the tendency or use it for His own purposes. This is the attitude of the Karmayogin who puts himself in God's hands and does work for His sake only, knowing that it is God's force that works in him. The result of that attitude of self-surrender is that the Lord of all takes charge and according to the promise of the Gita delivers his servant and lover from all sin and evil, the vrittis working in the bodily machine without affecting the soul and working only when He raises them up for His purposes. This is nirliptata, the state of absolute freedom within the lila.

The law is the same for the mass as for the individual. The process of human evolution has been seen by the eye of inspired observation to be that of working out the tiger and the ape. The forces of cruelty, lust, mischievous destruction, pain-giving, folly, brutality, ignorance were once rampant in humanity they had full enjoyment; then by the growth of religion and philosophy they began in periods of satiety such as the beginning of the christian era in Europe to be partly replaced, partly put under Control. As is the law of such things, they have always reverted again with greater or less violence and sought with more or less success to reestablish themselves. Finally in the nineteenth century it seemed for a time as if some of these forces had, for a time at least, exhausted themselves and the hour for sanyama and gradual dismissal from the evolution had really arrived. Such hopes always-dear and in the end they are likely to bring about their own fulfillment, but before that happens another recoil is inevitable. We see plenty of signs of it in the falling back into the beast which is in progress in Europe and America behind the fair outside of Science, progress, civilisation and humanitarianism, and we are likely to see more signs of it in the era that is coming upon us. A similar law holds in politics and society. The political evolution of the human race follows certain lines of which the most recent formula has been given in the watchwords of the French Revolution, freedom, equality and brotherhood. But the forces of the old world, the forces of despotism, the forces of traditional privilege and selfish exploitation, the forces of unfertile strife and passionate self-regarding competition are always struggling to reseat themselves on the thrones of the earth. A determined movement of reaction is evident in many parts of the world and nowhere perhaps more than in England which was once one of the self-styled champions of progress and liberty. The attempt to go back to the old spirit is one of those necessary returns without which it cannot be so utterly exhausted as to be blotted out from the evolution. It is only to be defeated and crushed again. On the other hand the force of the democratic tendency is not a force which is spent but one which has not yet arrived, not a force which has had the greater part of its enjoyment but one which is still vigorous, unsatisfied and eager for fulfilment. Every attempt to coerce it in the past reacted eventually on the coercing force and brought back the democratic spirit fierce, hungry and unsatisfied joining to its fair motto "Liberty, Equality and Fraternity" the terrible addition "or Death". It is not likely that the immediate future of the democratic tendency will satisfy the utmost dreams of the lover of liberty who seeks an anarchist freedom, or of the lover of equality who tries to establish a socialistic dead level or of the lover of fraternity who dreams of a world-embracing communism. But some harmonisation of this great ideal is undoubtedly the immediate future of the human race. On the old forces of despotism, inequality and unbridled competition, after they have been once more overthrown, a process of gradual sanyama will be performed ed by which what has to remain of them will be regarded as the disappearing vestiges of a dead reality and without any further violent coercion be transformed slowly and steadily out of existence.

AFFRAY IN CALCUTTA.

Three Men Stabbed.

A riot of a most serious character broke out on Wednesday night in Burtollah Street, resulting in three up-country men being seriously wounded and they are reported to be in a dying condition. The riot took place between two factions. The leader of one of which is Heera Gowallah of Burtollah Street, and the leader of the other is Bilatoo of Machua Bazar street. For years past ill-feeling had existed between the members of the two factions who, it is said, were constantly quarrelling among themselves. The strained relationship between the two factions culminated on Wednesday night in a fight of a most sanguinary character. About 10-30 p. m. the Machua Bazar Street faction, headed by Bilatoo, armed with various weapons including large knives and "daos" marched to Burtollah street and provoked a quarrel with the Heera Gowallah faction. In a few minutes the two factions each numbering about fifteen men, began attacking each other in a savage manner with their knives and "daos." A man named Baijor, belonging to Bilatoo's faction, had his right hand completely cut away besides sustaining other severe wounds about his body and legs. The local Police on receipt of the news hastened to the scene which was also visited by Superintendent Creagan and Mr. Tegart, Deputy Commissioner of Police. The fight lasted about twenty minutes. The mob then dispersed though not before several arrests had been made by the Police.

The wounded man, Bijpath, charged one Hurria and his father Sew Pal, with wounding him with knives and "daos" while Hurria, who was wounded severely, complained against Bilatoo and his brother, Fazeh. Bijpath, it is said had previously committed a violent assault upon a member of another faction for which he was convicted and sent to jail. During the height of the riot an Indian passer-by being mistaken for one of the gang, was severely stabbed, necessitating his removal to the Medical College Hospital, where the other two wounded men were also admitted. All the three men are reported to be in a dying condition. The Police are making further enquiries with a view to arresting the other men implicated in the riot.

A GREAT MARATHI INVENTOR AND HIS EPOCH-MAKING INVENTION.

Professor S. A. Bhisey of Bombay who had been carrying on his mechanical experiments and original researches in London for some years past has returned to his mother-country with the world-wide renown of the inventor of a type-casting machine which bids fair to revolutionise the initial stages of printing processes hitherto known to the best mechanical engineers of the world. The machine, called the "Bhisotype" after his name, not only casts type at a far greater rate than any existing machine, but produces finished type, which requires no after-trimming. While an ordinary type-casting machine casts about 80 to 100 types a minute and a power-driven machine, about 800 to 1,000 per minute, the "Bhisotype" casts 2,400 types per minute. The types, turned out by the "Bhisotype," are cast in hard metal and, as delivered from the machine, are as we have said, a finished product, requiring no subsequent trimming. They are of excellent quality, and are suitable for high class book-printing, or news-paper work. Moreover, the machine being exceedingly compact and simple in its constructional details, occupies the smallest amount of floor space, and can be worked both by hand and by power as the case may be. Professor Bhisey has further added to the utility of the Type-casting machine by connecting with it a battery of type-composing machines, and he has succeeded in effecting such smooth working of the two that the compositor at each of the eight or ten connected machines will receive type at the rate of 150 to 200 per minute.

Professor Bhisey has also invented among other things an advertising lamp, which only add to the glory of his inventive genius. Further, some ten years ago he competed against European inventors for a prize offered by an English paper for an original weighing and delivering machine suitable for sugar, rice, coffee, etc., and won the prize, being the first Indian to succeed as a modern prize-taker in the West. But to trace the progress of his inventive genius, it is his extraordinary keenness for mechanical work from a school-boy and his independence of character (as is evident from the means he adopted from his boyhood to support himself and as is essential to the free culture of genius) that have made him a world-renowned inventor. His work is not only appreciated in Europe, but in India also we have the warm appreciation of his worth in the following lines from the Presidential Address of Mr. R. N. Mudholkar at the last Industrial Conference held at Madras. Mr. Mudholkar said, "We have a J. C. Bose and a T. K. Gajjar, men, of whom the scientific world must feel proud. But we want more Boses and more Gajjars. And here, gentlemen, I would on behalf of you all offer congratulations to a countryman—Professor Bhisey of Bombay, who has just returned from England after having perfected a new machine which promises to revolutionise the art of printing through the novel and original processes invented by him in regard to type-casting and type-setting."

THE DAWN,

THE CO-OPERATIVE HINDUSTHAN BANK.

—000—

We have received a General Circular giving the rules of business and a statement of the achievements of the Bank during the half year ending 30th June. The Bank has paid dividend at the rate of six per cent. on Preference and Deferred Shares and at the rate of seven and a half per cent. on Ordinary Shares. It has opened agencies at over half-a-hundred centres and is working well. Bengal can congratulate herself at the signal success of her banking enterprises. Two previous attempts ending in disaster had made her shy capital extremely reluctant to come out of the strong room. But as trade expands into commerce it becomes necessary to work on the Joint Stock system by which—to quote Davenant—"the wealth and strength of many are guided by the care and wisdom of a few." And for the working of Joint Stock Companies the establishment of Banks is essential. To meet this demand two Banks were projected and established with the growth of the Swadeshi movement in Bengal. And there was room for more. Both, we are glad, are in existence. But while one made the initial mistake of placing on the committee for management men who not ought to have been there and began by appointing a European manager the other clearly avoided these rocks-a-head and is now prospering. We hope and trust it will prove a pillar of strength for the Swadeshi movement and open out a new path for the prosperous progress of Indian capital in Indian enterprises

THE "YOUNG MUSLIM."

The Young Muslim, which is started in London (236 Grog's Inn, London W. C.) since May last and is conducted by Mr. Saiyad Haidar Riza, is a monthly record of the new Mahomedan Thought. It represents the nationalist school of Indian Mahomedans, and the ideal of the organ is "the development of true manhood in all its spheres of activity, social, political, religious, and industrial, for the benefit of oneself and one's country." It is the firm belief of the school the paper represents that "the good of the Muslim community, possessing as it does a disinct individuality of its own, can be best served only through the good of the Indian nation as a whole." The paper is priced so as to be within the easy reach of all (Rs. 1-8-0) and we hope it will meet with wide circulation. The spirited manner and the logical nature of the organ may be gathered from the following passage from the issue of the paper for June and July:—

"The birth of Islam did not take place in the land of the Fire-worshippers or the land of the Pharaohs, The Mother-country, Arabia, sent her branches off to the distant fields, and there they took root. If the Mahomedans can regard Morocco and Egypt as their own lands, if the Mahomedans can shed their blood for the soil of Persia, we shall judge the Mahomedans of India to be a standing shame to the name of Islam if they swerve from allegiance to the luxuriant and exuberant banks of the Ganges and the Brahmaputra. Nay, we shall say more. India has the largest population of Mahomedans in the world. China, with its teeming millions sprinkled over far and wide with Islamic elements, Russia with all its vast lands of Siberia and the pure Islamic countries of Turkestan and Caucasus tracts, Turkey with her immense Mahomedan Empire, Egypt with her vigorous and progressive followers of the Prophet, Persia with her mujtahids and strong orthodoxy nay even Arabia, the root of our holy religion, fall far behind the fertile soils of India in the population of the Mussulmans they contain. India was the seat of the biggest Mahomedan Empire, India produced some of the best of Mahomedan statesmen and Emperors, India reared some of the bravest Mahomedan generals and soldiers, India gave to the Muslim world the most learned Mujtahids whose superiority of intellect, learning and divinity was acknowledged in Persia, Turkey and Arabia, whose Decrees of Religion (Fatwas) were obeyed in Mecca, Medina, Karbala and Najaf, and who are regarded second to prophets only in the Muslim religion. We maintain that if the Muslims have no interest in India, if they have no stake in the plains of the Indus and the valleys of the Himalaya, if they can bear no love to the holy tombs of the Muslim Saints at Ajmere and Delhi, if they cannot regard with affection the stones erected over the sacred bowers of their sturdy and warlike fathers, then they have no stake in any part of the world; then the feelings and sentiments of patriotism and devotion to the land cannot be roused in their breasts, reside in whatever part of the world they may; then they cannot call Persia Turkey, Egypt and Arabia their own; then they may proudly come before the world and say they are homeless like the Jews. In fact he will be the greatest benefactor of India in particular, and Muslim world in general, who could deepen the sense of devotion to India in the mind of the Indian Moslems, and who can prove to them that India is their own land--the land of their hearth and home."—Maharaja.

A NEWSPAPER SUBSCRIBER HARRASSED.

The Swaraj of Allahabad publishes the following from one of its subscribers at Pasrur:—

On 17th August last, the Sub-Inspector of Pasrur sent for me and asked me to give him my copy of the paper (Swaraj) as he wanted to see it.

Subscriber—I have not got the paper with me at present.

Sub-Inspector—I order you to bring it at once.

S.—Had I got the paper, I would have at once brought it.

S. I.—You don't lose anything in it, you bring me the paper.

S.—As soon as I receive the paper I read it and pass it on to others to read. I can not get it back now.

S. I.—Our Sahib wants to see the paper, you bring it.

S.—I say I have not the paper with me. If the Sahib is so fond of seeing it, I can get you a piece post card, you may write to the Swaraj office and the Sahib Bahadur will directly get the paper.

S. I.—We had written to the Swaraj office. We have received a reply from them that at Pasrur one Tara Chand gets the paper. And as you have got the paper it is advisable that you bring any issue of it.

S.—At present I have no issue with me. You can search my house if you like. If you are so fond of seeing the paper, you write to the Nagaraj office and you are sure to get the paper. You may return it or not, as you like.

S. I.—Very well. You may go now. There would have been no harm if you had given me the paper. But now I shall report against you.

S.—Sir! I am not a badmash, I am not a thief. What report will you make against me?

S. I.—Impertinent Fellow! You are a great rebel. The report I will make against you will be that you are a rebel. You subscribe for political papers and give them to the people to read.

I saluted the Thanedar Sahib and returned home. I am at a loss to understand what fault I have committed. If I am a rebel or a badmash because I subscribe a political paper, it is desirable that the publication of all papers be stopped so that people may not read them. I have given a true account, without any addition or subtraction, of the conversation, I had with the Sub-Inspector, Pasrur, on Friday, 17th.

The Jhang Syal writes that most probably the Sub-Inspector has not got a promotion for a long time and he wants to "score" something to deserve it.

POLICEMEN CONVICTED.

AN ECHO OF THE TRIVANDRUM RIOTS.

A Trivandrum correspondent states that soon after the riots last June Jupesa Iyer, who was alleged to be a Swadeshi preacher, was arrested kept in Police custody, and it is alleged, severely tortured and let off after more than one day. He preferred a complaint for unlawful detention torture by the Police, etc. In disposing of the case the Magistrate has convicted five out of the seven policemen charged and made strong remarks. The Magistrate says: "That the complainant was taken to the Cantonment station at noon on the 27th and detained there till the evening of the 28th is not seriously disputed by the defence. This fact is abundantly proved by the evidence of the prosecution witnesses 4, 6, 13, 15, and 17. The 15th witness is Mr. Ananda Row, head sircar wakil. He was accompanied to the Cantonment station by the fourth prosecution witness. Mr. Ananda Row found that this complainant with other persons was being starved in the lock-up and he remonstrated with the Inspector of Police, Cantonment station, the 17th witness for the prosecution, and owing to his good offices the Inspector got some cakes for the men in the lock-up, who had been without any food ever since their incarceration there the previous day. . . . The complainant appears to have been detained in the Cantonment station for a period of more than 24 hours since he was arrested first by the police and put in the fort lock-up. There is no record to show that he was ever detained in the lock-up of that station, and but for the adventitious circumstance of Mr. Ananda Row having seen the prisoner, the detention would never have come to light at all."

Regarding the Police methods the Magistrate says: "The complainant was detained beyond the period allowed by the law, and in letting him off without complying with the requirements of the law the policemen appear to have acted beyond their powers. No arrest report to the District Magistrate, no entry of the names in any book no "kychit" or recognizance bond was taken when he was let off. Nothing whatever, not a scrap of paper, to show that he was even arrested, confined or let off—a very extraordinary procedure.

"There is not a title of evidence to show that the complainant was a Swadeshi lecturer, and I am not aware of any law in Travancore which authorises the arrest by the police in the first instance of Swadeshi lecturers. The Superintendent of Police says he used the term Swadeshi lecturer in this statement to mean a propagator of seditious sentiments regarding the Government, British and Travancore. Even granting the use of that term in that extended sense I can see no reasonable ground for the arrest of the complainants. There is no regular report of the substance of any Swadeshi lecture."

PROHIBITION OF "JUSTICE."

In the Commons, Mr. W. Thorne asked the Under Secretary for India whether Justice had been absolutely prohibited from being taken into India, and if so on what ground this action against the liberty of the Press had been taken?

The Master of Elibank: The Government of India represented to the Secretary of State that they regarded the articles in Justice directed against British rule in India as inflammatory and mischievous in their effects on certain sections of Indian opinion. The Secretary of State entirely concurred, and has sanctioned the exercise of statutory powers of prohibition which they have already enforced in the case of Krishnavarma's publication, the Indian Sociologist.

Mr. W. Thorne: Can the honourable gentleman state how it is that Justice, which is the only one of the Socialistic papers circulating in India, should be refused, while similar articles appear in other Socialistic papers which have not been prohibited?

The Master of Elibank: If the Honourable Member will bring before me any other Socialistic papers, I should be glad to consider the matter (laughter).

Mr. W. Thorne: Surely you don't think I am so foolish as that (laughter).

POLICE TORTURE.

The Sessions Judge of Godavari has delivered judgement in the case of police torture against Sub-Inspector Mahomed Khyrati, a head constable and two constables attached to Jagannpet Police Station for wrongful confinement and culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The Sub-Inspector was sentenced to five years the head constable to seven years and the constables to four years' imprisonment. The facts of the case were that while eliciting information they thrashed and beat the accused in Jagannpet severely. One died and the other attempted suicide.

AN INDIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

At a meeting of some two hundred Indian merchants, of Rangoon, held on the 13th September at the Victoria Hall, there was established a Chamber of Commerce under the name of the "Rangoon Indian Chamber of Commerce." Committee members were appointed and some fifty merchants and firms joined the new Chamber as members.

SEARCH IN JESSORE.

A correspondent writes under date the 10th:—Yesterday the Jessore Patrika office was searched with a view, it is alleged, to obtain some clue with regard to the Satnathia dacoity case. Nothing incriminating, however, was found. Two letters and a Jama Kharach were seized and taken possession of by the over-zealous police officers.

DHINGRA'S CRIME EXTOLLED.

Most of the London newspaper, as well as a number of private individuals, received this week an anonymous document dealing with Dhingra affair. The pamphlets were sent from Paris. On the cover is a small photograph of Dhingra and a reproduction of the statement he made in court, at the trial. The rest of the document is a wild attack on the British and the Government. All Indians are exhorted to follow Dhingra's example, and the writer holds assassination to be an act of heroism. Lord Ampthill, in a letter to the press, refers to the assertion of the Daily News that the alleged statement of Dhingra had been for some time in the possession of certain of his compatriots. It seems impossible, says Lord Ampthill, that those compatriots should have obtained a copy after Dhingra's arrest and if so it shows that there are some who knew of the murderer's intention before he committed the ghastly crime.

THE DEPORTEES.—

Mr. O'Grady asked the Under Secretary whether the Government had yet received any report as to whether the cases of the nine gentlemen who were arrested and deported in December had been reconsidered.

The Master of Elibank: The Secretary of State has not received any report from the Government of India.

In reply to further questions he said he had made it clear that the report to be supplied every six months had reference to the question of the health, comfort and conduct of the prisoners. If the Honourable Member pressed the point of his question too closely, it would be impossible for the Government of India to consider the case of these prisoners except as specified by the Regulation on two specified occasions in each year. The Secretary of State had the question of the deportees constantly in mind, and he had not the slightest doubt that he would release those prisoners at the moment when the Government of India considered it would be in the public interest.

Mr. Mackarness asked whether the words were not perfectly clear that the Government of India were to consider whether the orders for detention were to continue in force, and whether the prisoners were to be further detained?

The Master of Elibank said it was a question of policy which had been decided by the House. The Prime Minister recently made a very emphatic declaration on the subject, and it was not competent for him to argue a question of policy on which the Cabinet had formed a decision which had been confirmed by the House.

THE "INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST."

Aldred the Printer of the "Indian Sociologist" was charged at old Baley on Sept. 10. The Attorney General in reciting objects of the publication of the "Indian Sociologist" declared that it aimed at the destruction of Indian Government mainly by murder of Englishmen and women. The publication was in no way a political but a criminal offence and was an attempt to influence the naturally susceptible class of fellow subjects coming to England to learn professions which they intended to practise in India. Aldred has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment in the First Division. Addressing the jury, he declared that the prosecution was a malicious one. He had never advocated political assassination.

KRISHNAVARMA'S PAPER.

Krishnavarma has found another printer for the Indian Sociologist in the shape of a Mr. Guy Aldred, who says "I am not personally concerned with any propaganda Mr. Krishnavarma may see fit to use. My reason for publishing the paper is my desire to vindicate the absolute freedom of the press. If I am proceeded against I intend to raise the point that absolute liberty of the press is granted by the British Constitution. I shall not plead ignorance or pretend that I do not know the risks I am running. I am championing the right to publish what is called seditious literature not in this case so much because it is seditious, but because the prohibition of Krishnavarma's publications would be the thin end of the wedge. It would be the beginning of a course which might end in the refusal of the right of Sir Henry Cotton or Mr. Hyndman to publish their political views.

ALDRED AT BOW STREET.

At Bow Street Guy Alfred Aldred, of the Bakunin Press, Stanlake Road Shepherd's Bush, was charged on a warrant with printing and publishing a seditious libel in the Sociologist.

Mr. A.H. Bodkin prosecuted on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions. He said it was a prosecution which would disclose some very serious matters in regard to the dissemination of seditious printing in this country and elsewhere. The offence was done deliberately by the defendant, after a warning not only as a printer but as a writer. Aldred held anarchistic views. He was known as an associate of anarchists in London, and he for six months had been in correspondence with Krishnavarma. In the autumn of 1908 there were outrages in India which resulted in the death of an Englishman, and four Indians were tried convicted and executed for wilful murder. The December number of the Indian Sociologist published an article headed the "Indian Martyrs' Memorial" and proposing a monument to those four men. Krishnavarma from his safe place in Paris, appealed to his fellow-countrymen to subscribe to these objects. That was referred to in the August number, for which Aldred was responsible. The first column, although not signed was by Krishnavarma. The article introduced Dhingra's crime in such a way as to put it in the light of an example to others and to who might read the particular publication. "The name of Madan Lal Dhingra," stated the article, "will go down to posterity as that of one who sacrificed his life on the altar of an ideal. His statement and conduct which are conspicuous for courage, truth and patriotism, put him on the very highest plane of the heroes of the world's struggle for freedom. Standing alone and defying the tyranny of tyrannical Britain, Dhingra appeals to us as one of the most remarkable figures in Indian history."

A paragraph over the initials of the prisoner stated:—I have undertaken the printing and publication of the paper in defence of a free press. Prisoner was remanded, on bail of £300.

MALARIA MORTALITY.—

Although Bengal did not suffer to the same extent from malaria last autumn, as the United Provinces and the Punjab, the mortality from fever was 1,184,700, a figure which is 1 1/2 per cent. than the quinquennial average. Patna and Gaya were most afflicted. The usually water logged areas such as Murshidabad Nadia Jessore and Purnea, being healthier owing to a deficiency of the rainfall. In Gaya, according to the local official report, the severe prevalence of malaria is due in the western part of the district to canal irrigation, and in other parts to the breeding ground afforded to the anopheles mosquito by large catchment basins and everywhere to retain the scanty rainfall. The people are, therefore, in an awkward predicament: they must have water to irrigate their crops and yet this brings fever in its train. The only means by which their health can be preserved would seem to be the prophylactic use of quinine. But in 1903 the absurdly small quantity of 13,307 parcels of the drug (each parcel containing 102 seven-grain pill packets) were sold in all Bengal, a decrease of 9,000 parcels as compared with the sales of the preceding year. There must be more energy shown in pushing the sale of quinine in malarious districts if any great effect is to be secured; and it is satisfactory to learn that this year measures have been taken to popularise its use by reducing the price and by issuing it in tablet form. The local Government should now have before it the report of Captain Forster, I. M. S., who made a special enquiry into the prevalence of malaria in the Purnea and Murshidabad districts. This might well be submitted to the Malaria Conference at Simla, as it should contain the latest information on the subject of high mortality from fever. Proctor

THE JESSORE TRAGEDY.—

The District Magistrate of Jessore, Mr. S. K. Augusty, has just concluded the preliminary enquiries into the case in which, as already reported, Sarajit Chandra Mukerjee, Khas Munshi, and Bhuban Mohan Mukerjee, Overseer, attached to the Naldanga Raj Estate, and Madhusudan Sen, a local Sub-Inspector of Police, were charged in connection with the death of Hindoy Nath Bosa, who, it will be remembered, died in the Calcutta Medical College Hospital making serious allegations against certain persons with reference to the injuries he received and from the effects of which he died. The evidence against the second accused having been found weak, the Magistrate has discharged him, while the first and the third accused have been committed to the Session Court under sections 325 and 330 of the Indian Penal Code.

NASEK SEDITION CASE.

Mr. Jackson, District Magistrate, Nasik, delivered judgment on the case in Mr. Barve's (Jagirdar of Kothara) case. The accused was convicted under section 124A, I. P. C. and sentenced to six months simple imprisonment. The Magistrate held that the seditious leaflets in Tamil were sent by Mr. Barve for distribution to excite disaffection. Mr. Barve knew their meaning in general. The expert's opinion about the identity of the accused's handwriting was correct.

A SWADESHI STEAMER.

A Swadeshi steamer has been plying for some months from Jhikargacha to Kopilmony in spite of the vast competition of the foreign company which has fixed its fare at 1 anna only for 32 miles, whereas it was full 16 annas formerly. The above company is up and doing in beating down the Swadeshi one which has yet sustained its existence in the struggle by the munificent patronage and sacrifice of the gentry. The Pujas are coming and we have every reason to hope that the gentlemen along the Kapatakshi will not fail to take the pride of travelling by their own Swadeshi steamer while going to visit their homes.

HOUSE SEARCH AT PARNNA.—

A correspondent writes:—The house of Babu Dinanath Biswas, a leading pleader of the local Bar, was surrounded on the 12th instant at about 11-30 a. m. by the police who commenced search immediately, which lasted for about half-an-hour. It was conducted by the local Inspector of Police accompanied by almost all the officers available in the Sudder and a Sub-Inspector from Tangail. Dina Babu was away at the time on a professional call at Tangail. The search was made with a view to arrest a relation of his, named Surendra Nath Roy, who came once to visit him about 3 weeks ago. The said Surendra Nath is said to be implicated in a "Swadeshi" case at Tangail and was absconding. But the attempt of the Police was fruitless and they went away without being able to find out the alleged absconder.

POLICE SEARCH AT DACCA.—

The Binapani Students' mess was searched on the 14th instant in connection with the Naranganj revolver find. Sitanath Das, elder brother of Brojaballav Das, who is a second year student of the Dacca College, lives in this mess. The police were not allowed to enter till Mr. Turner Principal, Dacca College, arrived who was present for the most of the time. Nothing incriminating was found among the belongings of Sitanath. In course of searching the boxes of other inmates the police seized some private letters containing national poems, a diary of a student written in 1905 in which the writer says he took active part in Sankirtan party held on the 30th Aswin, a copy of the "Karmajogin", photos of Babu Bepin Pal, Lakat Hossain and a book named "Bandava" containing a collection of national songs. The police behaved courteously throughout the search.

THE LATE MR. GOKHALE.—

It is a sad misfortune that we have to announce the sudden death of Mr. Keshavnrao Gokhale M. A. B. L. of Nagpur. Mr. Gokhale was a leading member of the Nagpur Bar, and one of the foremost Nationalist public workers in that province. In all the recent state prosecutions against the Deshasevak he worked disinterestedly for the accused in the law Courts, and it is too well-known how ably he conducted the defence. It was only a short while after he concluded his work as a defence-counsel in the last Deshasevak prosecution that he fell an unexpected victim to plague. In him the Central Provinces have lost a distinguished member of the bar, an ardent Nationalist, and a young and enthusiastic public worker. We tender our condolence to his bereaved relatives and to the afflicted people of the Province; and hope that the lamentable loss of a public leader like Mr. Gokhale, instead of disheartening the public workers will only stimulate them the more in their work and add to their earnestness.—Mahratta.

THE BENGAL PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

I do not forget the tremendous price we pay, on all operations of this sort in the reaction and excitement which they provoke. But there are situations in which a responsible Government is bound to run these risks and pay this possible price. It is like war a hateful thing. The only question for us is whether there is such a situation in India today to justify the passing of this Act of the other day, and to justify a resort to 1818. I cannot imagine that any one reading the list of crimes given the other day, and remembering all that they stand for, can have any doubt that summary procedure is justified and called for. . . . And we must protect the peaceful inhabitants both Indian and European from bloodshed." His Lordship was content with remarking that the anarchists are few but what if the anarchists be only a dozen then about the "list of crimes? I only wish his Lordship would revise the list, now that the state trials are almost over. I venture to think that the conclusion arrived at by His Lordship is not a sound one and it is based simply on a very strong desire for not weakening the hands of H. E. the Viceroy. When along with repressive measures certain important reforms are going to be introduced, we may fairly indulge in the hope that the retention of the regulation is attributable to the excitement which prevails in the higher circles of Government and no sooner equanimity is restored the laudable efforts of friends and sympathisers like the Hon'ble Mr. Mackerness M. P. will meet with success. It is extremely to be regretted and is a matter of great surprise that in consequence of a few assassinations by some youths of unbalanced mind and the manufacture of a few bombs the Government should have got so much excited and there should have been such a panic amongst some officials. This reminds me of a couplet from our well known poet.

"অসুস্থি আশোষিত শুভক কুংকরে নগেন্দ্র ভবন কল্প পতঙ্গ বিবাসে"

LONDON ASSASSINATION.

A portion of the Anglo-Indian Press is chiefly responsible for the panic and excitement, and it is no wonder that the recent assassination in England by an Indian (not a Bengali) was sought to have been connected with the agitation which is going on in British India though as you all know the suggestion or rather the insinuation has been officially and authoritatively negatived.

DEPORTEES

Now let us consider about the necessity of the deportation. Are the deportees rebels—seditionists? Did they by their conduct or act or speeches or writings furnish reasons to suspect that they were doing anything to disseminate revolutionary or anarchical ideas, or to create or encourage disloyalty or disaffection to Government or anything else for the subversion of Government or can anything be imputed to them as having brought into existence the unrest that prevails in United Bengal? Can the Government on reasonable grounds fairly conceive for a moment that the deportees had it in their power, even if they were so inclined, to bring about a revolution or a rebellion? Who does not know that Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt is an well educated pious gentleman of high moral character, who is the proprietor of an efficient College, affiliated to the Calcutta University, for giving high education to his fellow countrymen and which he maintained at a considerable personal sacrifice? Who does not know that he was the life and soul of every public movement in Barisal? And who does not know that when only the other day famine appeared in Barisal, without getting any financial aid from the Government he moved about the whole District and raised a sufficiently large fund, I believe, over a lac of rupees, for relieving thousands of famine-stricken people, Hindus and Mahomedans alike, from their distress, nay saved many lives from death from starvation?

Who does not know that Babu Krishna Kumar Mitter the well-known Editor of the "Sanjibani" from the very first time that unrest made its appearance in United Bengal advocated and preached loyalty to the throne, respect for law and order, and an abhorrence of disloyalty and lawlessness? In his speeches also he emphasised what appeared in his paper and he like Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt was respected and loved by all law abiding subjects. Babu Subodh Chandra Mullick who does not appear to have taken any prominent part in any political meeting or agitation, is the donor of the princely sum of a lac of rupees which has been endowed for the benefit of the National Council of Education at Calcutta. The country has such high regard and attachment for him that he is popularly called Rajah Subodh Chandra Mullick. Let every man, Hindu, Mussalman or belonging to any other creed in Bengal and East Bengal and Assam be examined he is sure to speak in one voice of the innocence of the deportees, who have got a very large credit in the bank of public opinion. After the deportation and with facts which the Government must now be in possession of, how can the further detention and incarceration of the deportees be justified? It is to be gathered from answers given to Hon'ble member of the British Parliament by the Secretary of State or the Master of Elibank on his behalf, that the matter has been left entirely in the hands of His Excellency the Viceroy who is to report every six months, about the deportees. What despatch His Excellency sends is not known to the public and we are quite in the dark as to the future of our beloved and respected deportees. If His Excellency the Viceroy now shows his magnanimity by ordering the restoration of liberty to the deportees, he would be doing a bare act of justice and would rise high in the estimation of the public and earn the affection and gratitude of the whole of the Bengalee speaking population of the two provinces.

HIS MAJESTY KING EMPEROR'S MESSAGE.

Amidst the turmoil, troubles, crimes of heinous nature, murders, attempts at murder, prosecution of Criminals and innocent deportations without trial, in our hour of affliction, misery, dejection and shame, comes from his Majesty the King Emperor a message of sympathy, kindness and good will, re-affirming in a clear and solemn way the proclamation of 1858 of our late beloved Queen Victoria our Magna Charta. The message gave a forecast of reforms intended to be introduced.

REFORM SCHEME.

Then under the shadow of regrettable events and unrest in India a Reform Scheme was announced by Lord Morley when making a statement in the house of Lords on Indian Policy. He said "Now the first important question that arises is that of reform and I would ask your Lordships to give close attention to it for a moment because I am sure that here and elsewhere it will be argued that the necessity and the facts that cause strong repressive measures should arrest our policy of reform. That has already been stated, and many people agree that the Government of India and myself have, from the beginning, never varied in our determination to persevere in our policy of reform."

TWO-FOLD POLICY OF GOVERNMENT.

Thus a two-fold policy is being followed by Government--drastic repressive measures for suppression of crime and sedition (supposed or real) on the one hand and proposals for reforming the administrative machinery on the other hand. The introduction of the reforms has however been preceded by a most liberal and generous act on the part of Government.

INDIAN MEMBER OF THE Viceroy's

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

I mean the appointment of our respected and beloved fellow subject the Hon'ble Mr. S. P. Sinha of Bengal, as a member of the Viceroy's Executive Council. The High office has been filled by an Indian for the first time and while we are, under a deep sense of gratitude to the Government for the appointment, we are justified in indulging in the hope that in the near future a much larger share would be given to the children of the soil in all departments of Government, and the financial control would be one of our rights.

APPOINTMENT OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

His Majesty the King Emperor's appointment of the present Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court, Sir Lawrence Jenkins, shows with what anxiety His Majesty and the Secretary of State for India are watching the situation in Bengal and are willing to remove the unrest which now prevails and to see restored the confidence in British justice. His Lordship the Chief Justice has by the administration of even-handed Justice, in utter disregard of persons and departmental interests, had already brought into existence a sense of security a full confidence in the High Court and in British Justice—one or two measures like these go a greater way to restore tranquility and peace than many repressive and drastic laws and order. Although we are now under a cloud, in view of the two-fold policy of Government we need not be pessimists or or despondents. It is indeed very gratifying to us that a worthy son of Bengal will now have a voice in the deliberations of all important questions from all departments for discussion in the Council, besides the special Department of which he may be in charge.

REFORM SCHEME.

It is not my object to enter fully into the Reforms proposed or to criticise in detail the different subjects covered by the scheme. Of course, the scheme is not up to our expectations and do not go far enough but we must admit that it is a good beginning and we must accept it with gratitude and good grace. The proposals no doubt bear the impress of thought and statesmanship but there are one or two matters connected with the Reform scheme which require our consideration and demand an expression of opinion by this Conference. I would only refer to those matters briefly giving an indication of my personal views and asking you to form your opinion and come to a resolution after due deliberation and discussion.

The main features of the Reform scheme consist of:—

- (1) Re-constitution and expansion of the Imperial Legislative Council and the Provincial Legislative Council.
- (2) Formation of Executive Councils in the larger Provinces with one or more Indian members.
- (3) Enlarged powers for Provincial Legislative Councils respecting the settlement of the Budget.
- (4) Non-official majority in the Provincial Legislative councils.
- (5) Larger powers of Provincial Legislative councils to interpellate and to discuss important and interesting questions in relation to executive administration and if necessary to move resolutions and divide the council on administrative questions of public and general interest.
- (6) Development of the principle of local self-Government by insisting on full effect being given to Lord Ripon's Local self-Government scheme of 1882.

Mentioning Lord Ripon's name I make a little pardonable digression for expressing our great grief at the death of his Lordship. We deplore his death for many reasons which I need not given in detail. He was known as the Father of Local Self-Government and even after his retirement he did what he could in Parliament for the benefit of India.

We find the Scheme as is formulated in the Despatches of the Secretary of State for India and His Excellency the Viceroy in Council with the Commentaries of Lord Morley in his speeches in the house of Lords and elsewhere. Association of Indians not only in the work of occasional legislation or debate on Budget, but real and effective Co-operation in every day administration must be treated as a substantial privilege.

It would be premature to express any opinion as to the actual working of the Scheme. Time alone will show to what extent and in what spirit allegiance would be shown to give full effect to the proposed reforms by those who would be entrusted with the carrying out of the scheme.

The scheme we must acknowledge to be the product of a policy which has been formulated for a long time by Statesmen like Mr. Bright, Mr. Macaulay, Lord Ripon, Lord Lansdowne and others. But it was left to Lord Morley and to His Excellency Lord Minto to give a tangible shape to the policy and announce a concrete scheme. The gift is a spontaneous one and not intended to purchase peace or to remove the unrest which prevails in the Empire.

The agitation against the partition of Bengal which still continues and which retains its original strength I venture to urge, will not subside or diminish by the introduction of the Reform Scheme. And here again I take the liberty to observe that not to speak of the Indian subjects of his Majesty, the King Emperor, what would the whole world have thought of Lord Morley if in his proposed scheme he had provided for a Governor with a Council for a province consisting of all Bengalee speaking population of Bengal and East Bengal and Assam? Such a measure would have brought about a modification of partition which would have satisfied the whole of United Bengal and would have removed the unrest and restored contentment. The partition of Bengal, as it is, has been declared by Lord Morley himself as a blunder but he declines to interfere as it is a 'settled fact.' From the spirit of the debate in the two Houses of British Parliament it can be easily seen that the British nation does not approve of the Partition. Lord Mc. Donnell has characterised it as the greatest blunder committed since the days of Plasy. Even Lord Curzon, as is well known to you, refused to admit the fatherhood on the occasion of a debate in the House of Lords. There is time yet before the actual introduction and operation of the Reform Scheme, for the Secretary of State for India, the wise Philosopher, historian, politician and statesman Lord Morley to reconsider the matter and modify the scheme in such a way that divided Bengal might be reunited, and in that case the reform scheme notwithstanding its inadequate nature would be hailed and accepted with joy, the repressive acts and uncalled for punishments forgotten and rest and contentment visible throughout the Province.

It is a matter rather of surprise that Lord Morley with his wisdom, erudition, experience and statesmanship and life-long liberal principles is not taking advantage of a golden opportunity for conferring an everlasting benefit on a Province, the destiny of which it has pleased Providence to place in the hands of England and British Government of which he is a responsible Minister. These are our expectations but I regret to find on the other hand two matters in connection with the reforms, which give a rude shock to our sentiments and aspirations. We have been aiming at self-Government on Colonial lines that is our goal and that is what is meant by "Swaraj." But Lord Morley in his speech delivered at Arbroath to "his constituency on 21st October 1907, is reported, to have said, that many people have said, "that whatever is good in the way of self-Government for Canada must be good for India. In my view that is the most concise statement that I can imagine and the grossest fallacy in all politics. I think it is a most dangerous, I think it is the hollowest and, I am sorry to say, the commonest of all the fallacies in the history of the world in all stages of civilisation. Because a particular policy or principle is true and expedient and vital in certain definite circumstances, therefore it is equally true and vital in a completely different of circumstances—a very dangerous and gross fallacy. You might just as well say that because a furcoat in Canada at certain times of the year is a most comfortable garment therefore a furcoat in the Dacca of India is a sort of handy garment which you might be very happy to wear. You might say, "oh, but a form of Government is one thing and a coat is another." I only throw it out to you as an example and an illustration. Where the historical traditions the religious beliefs, the racial conditions are all different—I do not want to be arrogant or insolent, but I say that to transfer by mere logic all the conclusion that you apply to one case to the other is the highest of political folly, and I for one, will never lend myself to that doctrine."

The conclusion arrived at by his Lordship for maintaining the policy of non-extension to India of self-Government on colonial lines is based upon general grounds of difference in historical traditions, religious beliefs and racial conditions. These differences do not, in my humble opinion present insurmountable difficulties and then again can continuity in the existing differences be asserted logically? Will not the world move will not there be changes and progress in India in connection with matters, social religious and everything else? If Lord Morley would be pleased to reconsider the question in a dispassionate way, I have no doubt, with his liberal ideas, he would have to change his opinion and remove the disappointment which has been caused by his utterances.

We regret to understand that Lord Morley in connection with the representation in Council has shown an inclination to favour a particular community on religious grounds. It would, I am afraid, be a sad mistake to make religion a factor for determining an electorate. Its effect would be to give permanency to racial religious conditions and to bring into existence and emphasise inharmonious relations which have shown signs of abatement and disappearance. Many Hindoo and Mahomedan leaders are persevering to the best of their abilities to work in a harmonious way forgetting differences in religious faiths.

Protection of minority is needed, but that protection can very easily be given by the judicious exercise of the power which will be retained by Government. A separate electorate at all stages for the Mahomedan community would make unity amongst Hindoos and Mahomedans an impossibility. The subject is one of vital interest and of very great importance and is receiving due attention and consideration from the Government. Let us hope that the Government will solve the problem in a way which may be satisfactory to both Hindoos and Mahomedans. It would be premature to say anything more on this subject.

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilised languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties—religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the Santi Parva of the MAHABHARATA, the longest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvas.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part (per V. P. P.) is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis rests his great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy. The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. Rebound L.E. 1-8. Postage Extra.

BRAHMACHYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras:—“An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion.”

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—“In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student.”

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon):—“Bramacharyya describes the life which Brahmachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind.”

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. I. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. “I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family.”

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Convention President.

The nomination of Sir Pherozshah Mehta as the President of the three men's Convention at Lahore is not an event that is of any direct interest to Nationalists. Just as the three tailors of Tooley Street represented themselves as the British public, so the three egregious mediocrities of the Punjab pose as the people of their province and, in defiance of the great weight of opinion among the leading men and the still stronger force of feeling among the people against the holding of a Convention Congress at Lahore, are inviting the representatives of the Moderate party to a session of what is still called, even under these discouraging circumstances, the Indian National Congress. It is of small importance to us whom these three gentlemen elect as their President. The nomination was indeed a foregone conclusion. Sir Pherozshah Mehta, having got rid of his Nationalist adversaries, now rules the Convention with as absolute a sway as he ruled the Corporation before the European element combined against him and showed that, servile as Bombay respectability might be to the Corporation lion, it was still more servile to the ruling class. Indirectly, however, the election is of some importance to Bengal owing to the desire of the people of this province for an United Congress. It is no longer a secret that in Bengal Moderate circles the feeling against Sir Pherozshah is almost as strong as it is in the Nationalist party. It has even been threatened that, if Sir Pherozshah becomes the President, Bengal will not attend the session at Lahore. This has since been qualified by the proviso that Bengal as a province will not attend, although some individuals may overcome their feelings or their scruples. Bengal as a province would in no case attend the sittings of a mutilated Congress. Even the whole Moderate party were not likely to attend unless their objections on the score of constitutional procedure were properly considered. All that the threat can mean is that, even of those would otherwise have gone, most will not attend. This is, after all, a feeble menace. Neither Sj. Surendranath nor Sj. Bhupendranath nor the Chaudhuri brothers are likely to forego attendance, and, for all practical purposes, these gentlemen are the Moderate party in Bengal. If the Bengal leaders do go to Lahore, they are certain to obey meekly the dictates of Sir Pherozshah Mehta; for there is not one of them who has sufficient strength of character to stand up to the roarings of the Bombay lion. They were in the habit of obeying him even when he had no official authority, and it can well be imagined how the strong, arrogant and overbearing man will demean himself as President, and how utterly impossible it will be even to suggest, either in Subjects Committee or in full meeting, any idea which will not be wholly palatable to the autocrat. Sj. Surendranath Banerji at Hughly advanced the strangely reactionary conception of the President of a Congress or Conference as by right not less absolute than the Czar of all the Russias, bound by no law and no principle and entitled to exact from the Conference or Congress implicit obedience to his most arbitrary and unconstitutional whims and caprices. This absolutist conception is likely to be carried out to the letter at the Lahore Convention. If ever there was any hope that the Lahore session of the Convention might be utilised for bringing about an United Congress, that has now disappeared. The hope was cherished by some, but it was from the first an idle expectation. A firm combination of all, whether Moderates or Nationalists, who are in favour of union, and the holding of a freely elected Congress at Calcutta was all along the only chance of bringing about union.

Presidential Autocracy.

The conception of the President as a Russian autocrat and the assembly as the slave of his whims is one which is foreign to free and democratic institutions, and would, if enforced, make all true discussion impossible and put in the hands of the party in possession of the official machinery an irresistible weapon for stifling the opinions of its opponents. It is a conception against which the Nationalist party have struggled from the beginning and will struggle to the end. The ruling of the President is final on all points of order, but only so long as he governs the proceedings of the body according to the recognised rules of debate. He cannot dictate the exclusion of resolutions or amendments which do not seem to him rational or expedient, but must always base his action on reasons of procedure and not on reasons of state. The moment he asserts his individual caprice or predilection, he lays himself open to an appeal to the whole assembly or even, in very extreme cases, to an impeachment of his action by a vote of censure from the delegates. It has been erroneously alleged that the Speaker of the House of Commons sways the House with an absolute control. The Speaker is as much bound by the rules of the House as any member; he is the repository of the rules and administers an old and recognised procedure, elaborate and rigid in detail, which he cannot transgress, nor has any Speaker been known to transgress it. Some have been suspected of administering the rules, wherever they left discretion to the Speaker, with a partiality for one party, but even this has been rare, and it was always the rules of procedure that were administered, not personal whim or caprice. As the present Speaker pointed out recently in his evidence before a public Commission, there is a recognised means by which the conduct of the Speaker can be called in question by the House. It would be strange if it were otherwise. The framers of the British Constitution, who so jealously guarded every loophole by which autocracy might creep into any part of the system, were not likely to leave such a glaring defect of freedom uncorrected, if it had ever existed.

Mr Lal Mohun Ghose.

The death of Mr Lal Mohun Ghose removes from the scene a distinguished figure commemorative of the past rather than representative of any living force in the present. His interventions in politics have for many years past been of great rarity and, since the Calcutta Congress, had entirely ceased. It cannot therefore be said that his demise leaves a gap in the ranks of our active workers. He was the survivor of a generation talented in politics rather than great, and, among them, he was one of the few who could lay claim to the possession of real genius. That genius was literary, oratorical and forensic rather than political but as these were gifts the which then commanded success in the political arena, he ought to have stood forward far ahead of the mass of his contemporaries. It was the lack of steadiness and persistence common enough in men of brilliant gifts, which kept him back in the race. His brother Mr. Manmohan Ghose, a much less variously and richly gifted intellect but a stronger character, commanded by the possession of these very qualities a much weightier influence and a more highly and widely honoured name. In eloquence we doubt whether any orator of the past or present generation has possessed the same felicity of style and charm of manner and elocution. Mr. Gokhale has something of the same debating gift, but it is marred by the dryness of his delivery and the colourlessness of his manner. Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose possessed the requisite warmth, glow and agreeableness of speech and manner without those defects of excess and exaggeration which sometimes mar Bengali oratory. We hope that his literary remains will be published, especially the translation of the Meghnad Badh, which, from such capable hands, ought to introduce favourably a Bengali masterpiece to a wider than Indian audience.

THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.

Our contemporary, the Statesman, notices in an unusually self-restrained article the recent brochure republished by Dr. A. K. Coomaraswamy from the Modern Review under the title, "The Message of the East." We have not the work before us but, from our memory of the articles and our knowledge of our distinguished countryman's views, we do not think the Statesman has quite caught the spirit of the writer. Dr. Coomaraswamy is above all a lover of art and beauty and the ancient thought and greatness of India, but he is also, and as a result of this deep love and appreciation, an ardent Nationalist. Writing as an artist, he calls attention to the debased aesthetic ideas and tastes which the ugly and sordid commercialism of the West has introduced into the mind of a nation once distinguished for its superior beauty and grandeur of conception and for the extent to which it suffused the whole of life with the forces of the intellect and the spirit. He laments the persistence of a servile imitation of English ideas, English methods, English machinery and production even in the new Nationalism. And he reminds his readers that nations cannot be made by politics and economics alone, but that art also has a great and still unrecognised claim. The main drift of his writing is to censure the low imitative un-Indian and bourgeois ideals of our national activity in the nineteenth century and to recall our minds to the cardinal fact that, if India is to arise and be great as a nation, it is not by imitating the methods and institutions of English politics and commerce, but by carrying her own civilisation, purified of the weaknesses that have overtaken it, to a much higher and mightier fulfilment than any that it has reached in the past. Our mission is to outdistance, lead and instruct Europe, not merely to imitate and learn from her. Dr. Coomaraswamy speaks of art, but it is certain that a man of his wide culture would not exclude, and we know he does not exclude, thought, literature and religion from the forces that must uplift our nation and are necessary to its future. To recover Indian thought, Indian character, Indian perceptions, Indian energy, Indian greatness, and to solve the problems that perplex the world in an Indian spirit and from the Indian standpoint, this, in our view, is the mission of Nationalism. We agree with Dr. Coomaraswamy that an exclusive preoccupation with politics and economics is likely to dwarf our growth and prevent the flowering of originality and energy. We have to return to the fountain-heads of our ancient religion, philosophy, art and literature and pour the revivifying influences of our immemorial Aryan spirit and ideals into our political and economic development. This is the ideal the Karmayogin holds before it, and our outlook and Dr Coomaraswamy's do not substantially differ. But in judging our present activities we cannot look, as he does, from a purely artistic and idealistic standpoint, but must act and write in the spirit of a practical idealism.

The debasement of our mind, character and tastes by a grossly commercial, materialistic and insufficient European education is a fact on which the young Nationalism has always insisted. The practical destruction of our artistic perceptions and the plastic skill and fineness of eye and hand which once gave our productions pre-eminence, distinction and mastery of the European markets, is also a thing accomplished. Most vital of all, the spiritual and intellectual divorce from the past which the present schools and universities have effected, has beggared the nation of the originality, high aspiration and forceful energy which can alone make a nation free and great. To reverse the process and recover what we have lost, is undoubtedly the first object to which we ought to devote ourselves. And as the loss of originality, aspiration and energy was the most vital of all these losses, so their recovery should be our first and most important objective. The primary aim of the prophets of Nationalism was to rid the nation of the idea that the future was limited by the circumstances of the present, that because temporary causes had brought us low and made us weak, low therefore must be our aims and weak our methods. They pointed the mind of the people to a great and splendid destiny, not in some distant millennium but in the comparatively near future, and fired the hearts of the young men with a burning desire to realise the apocalyptic vision. As a justification of what might otherwise have seemed a dream and as an inexhaustible source of energy and inspiration, they pointed persistently to the great achievements and grandiose civilisation of our forefathers and called on the rising generation to recover their lost spiritual and intellectual heritage. It cannot be denied that this double effort to realise the past and the future has been the distinguishing temperament and the chief uplifting force in the movement, and it cannot be denied that it is bringing back to our young men originality, aspiration and energy. By this force the character, temper and action of the Bengali has been altered beyond recognition in a few years. To raise the mind, character and tastes of the people, to recover the ancient nobility of temper, the strong Aryan character and the high Aryan outlook, the perceptions which made earthly life beautiful and wonderful, and the magnificent spiritual experiences, realisations and aspirations which made us the deepest-hearted, deepest-thoughted and most delicately profound in life of all the peoples of the earth, is the task next in importance and urgency. We had hoped by means of National Education to affect this great object as well as to restore to our youth the intellectual heritage of the nation and build up on that basis a yet greater culture in the future. We must admit that the instrument which we cherished and for which such sacrifices were made, has proved insufficient and threatens, in unfit hands, to lose its promise of fulfilment and be diverted to lower ends. But the movement is greater than its instruments. We must strive to prevent the destruction of that which we have created and, in the meanwhile, build up a centre of culture, freer and more perfect, which will either permeate the other with itself or replace it if destroyed. Finally, the artistic awakening has been commenced by that young, living and energetic school which has gathered round the Master and originator, Sri Abanindranath Tagore. The impulse which this school is giving, its inspired artistic recovery of the past, its intuitive anticipations of the future, have to be popularised and made a national possession.

Dr. Coomaraswamy complains of the survivals of the past in the preparations for the future. But no movement, however vigorous, can throw off in a few years the effects of a whole century. We must remember also why the degradation and denationalisation, "the mighty evil in our souls," of which the writer complains, came into being. A painful but necessary work had to be done, and because the English nation were the fittest instrument for his purpose, God led them all over those thousands of miles of alien Ocean, gave strength to their hearts and subtlety to their brains, and set them up in India to do His work, which they have been doing faithfully, if blindly, ever since and are doing at the present moment. The spirit and ideals of India had come to be confined in a mould which, however beautiful, was too narrow and slender to bear the mighty burden of our future. When that happens, the mould has to be broken and even the ideal lost for a while, in order to be recovered free of constraint and limitation. We have to recover the Aryan spirit and ideal and keep it intact but enshrined in new forms and more expansive institutions. We have to treasure jealously everything in our social structure, manners, institutions, which is of permanent value, essential to our spirit or helpful to the future; but we must not cabin the expanding and aggressive spirit of India in temporary forms which are the creation of the last few hundred years. That would be a vain and disastrous endeavour. The mould is broken; we must remould in larger outlines and with a richer content. For the work of destruction England was best fitted by her stubborn individuality and by that very commercialism and materialism which made her the anti-type in temper and culture of the race she governed. She was chosen too for the unrivalled efficiency and skill with which she has organised an individualistic and materialistic democracy. We had to come to close quarters with that democratic organisation, draw it into ourselves and absorb the democratic spirit and methods so that we might rise beyond them. Our half-aristocratic half-theocratic feudalism had to be broken in order that the democratic spirit of the Vedanta might be released and, by absorbing all that is needed of the aristocratic and theocratic culture, create for the Indian race a new and powerful political and social organisation. We have to learn and use the democratic principle and methods of Europe, in order that hereafter we may build up something more suited to our past and to the future of humanity. We have to throw away the individualism and materialism and keep the democracy. We have to solve for the human race the problem of harmonising and spiritualising its impulses towards liberty, equality and fraternity. In order that we may fulfil our mission we must be masters in our own home. It is out of no hostility to the English people, no race hatred that we seek absolute autonomy, but because it is the first condition of a developing our nation's self and realising our destiny. It is for this reason that the engineering political preoccupation came upon us and we cannot give up or tone down our political movement until the lesson of democratic self-government is learned and the first condition of national self-fulfilment realised. For another reason also England was chosen, because she had organised the commerce and industry of commerce, with its fierce and continuous struggle for existence in the most skillful, disorganised and successful fashion. We had to look in the light of that system and learn the literal meaning of the industrial revolution of Darwinism. It has been written large for us in the ghastly letters of famine, economic starvation and misery and a decreasing population. We have risen at last, entered into the battle and with the British for a weapon, are fighting at the direct of British commerce, even as it struck at them first by protection and then by free trade. Again it is not one of hatred that we strike, but one of self preservation. We must conquer in that battle if we are to live. We cannot grant our development of industry and commerce while waiting for a more universal system of development for beauty and art to conquer the world. As to politics so in commerce we must conquer and master the European system in order that we may eventually replace them. The crude commercial system which has so disgusted and disappointed us is an integral part of the national development as the movement of the new School of Art. If this crude Shodshi were

ed so highly, would wither and sink with the drying up of the soil in which it was planted. A nation need not be luxuriously wealthy in order to be profoundly artistic, but it must have a certain amount of well-being, a refined culture and above all heart and ardour, if it is to create a national art based on a well-developed and artistic imagination and faculty. Moreover, our arts and crafts cannot live against the onrush of cheap and vulgar manufactures under the conditions of the modern social structure. Industry can only become again beautiful if poverty and the struggle for life are eliminated from society and the co-operative State and economic organised as the fruit of a great moral and spiritual uplifting of humanity. We hold such an uplifting and reorganisation as part of India's mission. But to do her work she must live. Therefore the economical preoccupation has been added to the political. We perceive the salvation of the country not in parting with either of these, but in adding to them a religious and moral preoccupation, on the basis of that religious and moral awakening the preoccupation of art and fine culture will be added and firmly based. There are many who perceive the necessity of the religious and moral regeneration, who are inclined to turn from the prosaic details of politics and commerce and regret that any guide and teacher of the nation should stoop to mingle in them. That is a grievous error. The men who would lead India must be ethical and religious. When the Vedic era came, it was like to him that he was not only the religious, but the political, for the Vedic era was the era of the regeneration of society, the captain of co-operative industry, with the soul of the poet, scholar and artist. He will be in short the summary and grand type of the future Indian nation which is rising to reshape and lead the world.

THE MAHOMEDAN ESSENTIAL TO THE HINDU.

The conception of unity can only arise in the mind as a reaction against an abject slavery or manliness. The conception of the unity similarly is a paradox to which we are provoked by too monotonous or too uniform a vision. One in many and diversity in unity are statements of which each part is necessary to the other. National unity demands diversity of elements; without these, the conception has no vigour or vitality. Physiologically, the body of a lobster is a unit. But it is not so high, because it is not so complex a unit, as the body of a man. In the lobster twenty-one different segments repeat each other, in man not even the right and left sides are strictly alike. Yet the man-mind, holding together and directing all this number of unlikes, is infinitely greater, stronger and more effective than the lobster-mind with its smaller number of component variations. This is the difference between a mechanical and an organic unity. A nation is an organic unity. It rises in rank amongst nations in proportion to its complexity. Its power to discover the laws of national well-being will be determined, amongst other things, by its recognition within itself of various equally important, strongly contrasted elements. Only by the progressive assertion of that which constitutes the common good of all these, can it be increasingly nationalised. For the term nationality is relative not absolute. No people are so possessed of it that they could not be more so; no people, having a country of their own at all, have so little that they might not have less. When a nation has made itself recognised in the comity of nations, it has still to carry out, in the highest and best ways, the task of promoting its own nationality. Nationality consists in the recognition and development of that which is common to all the components of the nation. Its immutable foundation is based in the sentiment of the common home. Thus, the credit of having created a certain type of architecture belongs to the Mahomedan. But the beauty of such buildings, worn like jewels on the neck of the motherland, gives as much joy to the Hindu. The existence of the Taj-mahal in India is a glory to all her children alike; the Hindu would die as readily as the Mahomedan in its defence. The rights and duties of the civic life are common to the two great sections of the people. The ideals of nationality are common also. Its sacrifices and achievements will also be common.

It was said that it is actually necessary to the national idea that it should take its birth from elements in strong mutual opposition. The higher the contrast, the greater the strength of the nationality created. This is well seen in English history. Spain, as the waymaker of Catholicism, was defeated by an English navy under a Catholic admiral in the time of Elizabeth. The Englishman's sense of nationality was so strong, that he never thought apparently of his church. The political parties, of which today one sings tweedledum to the other's tweedledee, were once the Cavaliers and Roundheads who made war on one another, fought pitched battles and beheaded a king. The common home and the common cause have only to be felt, in order to drive all other considerations into the background. He who says that more is necessary to nation-making, is but a poor builder. If the common language were essential, could the Swiss be a nation? If common religion were essential, could the Germans be a nation? If a common history were essential, could England herself, built up of warring factions, be a nation? If any thing more than the common home and common future were required, what hope would there be for America today? An aggregation of villages forms a district, not a country. The language of a province need not be interprovincial. A nation can assimilate any number of unlike units, provided only there be the common home.

In India, as a matter of fact, national greatness has always occurred as a resultant of two opposed ideas. The Empire of Pataliputra was made popular and democratic under Asoka, when acted on by the ideas of Buddhism. Buddhism was neither more nor less, at that period than the democratising of the highest Aryan culture. Here we have two forces acting at right angles to one another—the Vedic, intensifying knowledge, on the forest ashrams, and the influence of the Buddhist orders, calling all men to share the life; thus gathered. Later these became the opposing forces of Hinduism with its ever-increasing subjection to the Brahmin, and the Sannyasin with his unbelief in a destiny imposed by birth,—caste and democracy, culture and social equality side by side. Under Mahomedanism again, the idea of human equality and fraternity, the idea that nothing depends on birth and all on individuality, again finds witness. Akbar is a Mahomedan deeply tinged with Hindu culture. Each of the great Moguls has his share of both.

To-day, if we had all been Hindus or all Mahomedans, we could not hope to have made an Indian nation. It is because we are both, that we shall swerve neither to the right hand nor the left, but create that body of thought, feeling and discipline which is yet to restore our Motherland to her ancient place. All men have certain characteristic ideas and intuitions which are apt to run to superstitions. All men are liable to mistake the superstition of a truth for the truth itself. The English are great in that power of organisation which rises out of commerce. But they have an idea that everything in the world must be subordinated to commerce. The one thing is a truth, the other a superstition. Only by the presence of a strongly contrasted faction, free from the spell of the given prepossession, can the line be safely drawn between truth and falsehood. The English cannot emancipate themselves from their own delusion, though it is easy enough for us to see and smile at it. Similarly we have to cancel out of the national culture all that is merely sectarian or mutually exclusive. Such things are to be relegated to the sphere of personal opinion or ecclesiastical practice. Only that which is to the honour and advantage of both Hindu and Mahomedan, may be spoken by either within the circle of the national life.

Let us look for a moment at how much this covers. First, food-supply and wealth. It needs no argument to prove that abundance of rice or wheat, abundance of wealth is as much to the good of Mahomedan as of Hindu. The one has as much to gain as the other from social stability, from a widespread amelioration of man; ners, from industrial revival, from increase of education, from the recovery of national prestige, the establishment of national universities and centres of learning, and from the recapture and development of the Aryan culture. Whether a man buttons his coat to right or to left and bathes at dawn or midday, are not matters that concern his nationality. But the increase of learning and power of self-direction amongst his own people will benefit the son of Islam as much as the children of the Sanatan Dharma, and what is gained for one is gained for both.

Mahomedans are related to Arabia by their whole past. That tie they need do nothing to strengthen, since their fathers have done it for them. What the Mahomedan has to do today, and what he knows he has to do and will not be prevented from doing, is to relate himself to India, the soil and the People. His own and his children's future depends on his doing this. Islam is no longer to be reckoned as a backward faith. The Caliph himself is the representative of progress and enlightenment, and it is not to be expected that the Mahomedans of India will be contented to lag behind their brethren in Turkey and in Persia.

CHAPTER IV

The darkness of the wood was very deep and Kalyani could not find her way. In the thickly woven entanglement of trees, creepers and thorns there was no path at the best of times and on that there came this impenetrable darkness. Separating the branches and creepers, pushing through thorn and briar Kalyani began to make her way into the thickness of the wood. The thorns pierced the child's skin and she cried from time to time; and at that the shouts of the pursuing robbers rose higher. In this way with torn and bleeding body, Kalyani made far progress into the woodland. After a little while the moon rose. Until then there was some slight confidence in Kalyani's mind that in the darkness the robbers would not be able to find her and after a brief and fruitless search would desert from the pursuit, but, now order that hereafter we may build up something more suited to our past and to the future of humanity. We have to throw away the individualism and materialism and keep the democracy. We have to solve for the human race the problem of harmonising and spiritualising its impulses towards liberty, equality and fraternity. In order that we may fulfil our mission we must be masters in our own home. It is out of no hostility to the English people, no race hatred that we seek absolute autonomy, but because it is the first condition of our developing our national life and realising our destiny. It is for this reason that the engrossing political preoccupation came upon us; and we cannot give up or tone down our political movement until the lesson of democratic self-government is learned and the first condition of national self-fulfilment realised. For another reason also England was chosen, because she had organised the competitive system of commerce, with its bitter and murderous struggle for existence in the most skilful, disinterested and successful fashion. We had to feel the full weight of that system and learn the literal meaning of this industrial realisation of Darwinism. It has been written large for us in ghastly letters of famine, chronic starvation and misery and a decreasing population. We have risen at last, entered into the battle and with the Bayonet for a weapon, are striking at the throat of British commerce even as it struck at ours, first by protection and then by free trade. Again it is not out of hatred that we strike, but out of self-protection. We must conquer in that battle if we are to live. We cannot arrest our development in industry and commerce while waiting for a new commercial system to develop or for beauty and art to reconquer the world. As in politics so in commerce, we must fence and master the European method, in order that we may eventually transcend them. The crude commercial system, which the Chomaraswamy finds so distasteful and disappointing, is an integral part of the national awakening as the movement towards Swami or as the new School of Art. If this crude Swadishi were

ed so highly, would wither and sink with the drying up of the soil in which it was planted. A nation need not be luxuriously wealthy in order to be profoundly artistic, but it must have a certain amount of well-being, a national culture and, above all, heart and ardour, if it is to maintain a national art based on a well rounded development of artistic perception and faculty. Moreover, artists and crafts cannot live against the onrush of cheap and vulgar manufactures under the conditions of the modern social structure. Industry can only become again beautiful if poverty and the struggle for life are eliminated from society and the co-operative State and commerce organised as the fruit of a great moral and spiritual uplifting of humanity. We hold such an uplifting and reorganisation as part of India's mission. But to do her work she must live. Therefore the economical preoccupation has been added to the political. We perceive the salvation of the country not in parting with either of these, but in adding to them a religious and moral preoccupation. On the basis of that religious and moral awakening the preoccupation of art and fine culture will be added and firmly based. There are many who perceive the necessity of the religious and moral regeneration, who are inclined to turn from the prosaic details of politics and commerce and regret that any guide and teacher of the nation should stoop to mingle in them. That is a grievous error. The men who would lead India must be catholic and universal. When the Avatar comes, we like to believe that he will be not only the religious guide, but the political, forerunner the great enlightener, the regenerator of society, the captain of co-operative industry, with the soul of the poet, scholar and artist. He will be in short the summary and grand type of the future Indian nation which is rising to reshape and lead the world.

THE MAHOMEDAN ESSENTIAL TO THE HINDU.

The conception of unity can only arise in the mind as a reaction against an obvious duality or multiplicity. The conception of the unity, similarly, is a paradox to which we are provoked by too monotonous or too uniform a vision. One in many and diversity in unity are statements of which each half is necessary to the other. National unity demands diversity of elements; without these, the conception has no vigour or vitality. Physiologically, the body of a lobster is a unit. But it is not so high, because it is not so complex a unit, as the body of a man. In the lobster twenty-one different segments repeat each other, in man not even the right and left sides are strictly alike. Yet the man-mind, holding together and directing all this number of unlikes, is infinitely greater, stronger and more effective than the lobster-mind with its smaller number of component variations. This is the difference between a mechanical and an organic unity. A nation is an organic unity. It rises in rank amongst nations in proportion to its complexity. Its power to discover the laws of national well-being will be determined, amongst other things, by its recognition within itself of various equally important, strongly contrasted elements. Only by the progressive assertion of that which constitutes the common good of all these, can it be increasingly nationalised. For the term nationality is relative not absolute. No people are so possessed of it that they could not be more so; no people, having a country of their own at all, have so little that they might not have less. When a nation has made itself recognised in the comity of nations, it has still to carry out, in the highest and best ways, the task of promoting its own nationality. Nationality consists in the accentuating and development of that which is common to all the components of the nation. Its immutable foundation is based in the sentiment of the common home. Thus, the credit of having created a certain type of architecture belongs to the Mahomedan. But the beauty of such buildings, worn like jewels on the neck of the motherland, gives as much joy to the Hindu. The existence of the Taj-mahal in India is a glory to all her children alike; the Hindu would die as readily as the Mahomedan in its defence. The rights and duties of the civic life are common to the two great sections of the people. The ideals of nationality are common also. Its sacrifices and achievements will also be common.

It was said that it is actually necessary to the national idea that it should take its birth from elements in strong mutual opposition. The higher the contrast, the greater the strength of the nationality created. This is well seen in English history. Spain, as the waymaker of Catholicism, was defeated by an English navy under a Catholic admiral in the time of Elizabeth. The Englishman's sense of nationality was so strong, that he never thought apparently of his church. The political parties, of which today one sings tweedledum to the other's tweedledee, were once the Cavaliers and Roundheads who made war on one another, fought pitched battles and beheaded a king. The common home and the common cause have only to be felt, in order to drive all other considerations into the background. He who says that more is necessary to nation-making, is but a poor builder. If the common language were essential, could the Swiss be a nation? If common religion were essential, could the Germans be a nation? If a common history were essential, could England herself, built up of warring factions, be a nation? If any thing more than the common home and common future were required, what hope would there be for America today? An aggregation of villages forms a district, not a country. The language of a province need not be interprovincial. A nation can assimilate any number of unlike units, provided only there be the common home.

In India, as a matter of fact, national greatness has always occurred as a resultant of two opposed ideas. The Empire of Pataliputra was made popular and democratic under Asoka, when acted on by the ideas of Buddhism. Buddhism was neither more nor less, at that period, than the democratising of the highest Aryan culture. Here we have two forces acting at right angles to one another—the Vedic, intensifying knowledge, in the forest ashramas and at universities like Sarnath, and the influence of the Buddhist orders, calling laymen to share the honey thus gathered. Later these became the opposing forces of Hinduism with its ever-increasing subjection to the Brahmin, and the Sannyasin with his unbelief in a destiny imposed by birth,—caste and democracy, culture and social equality side by side. Under Mahomedanism again, the idea of human equality and fraternity, the idea that nothing depends on birth and all on individuality, again finds witness. Akbar is a Mahomedan deeply tinged with Hindu culture. Each of the great Moguls has his share of both.

To-day, if we had all been Hindus or all Mahomedans, we could not hope to have made an Indian nation. It is because we are both, that we shall swerve neither to the right hand nor the left, but create that body of thought, feeling and discipline which is yet to restore our Motherland to her ancient place. All men have certain characteristic ideas and intuitions which are apt to run to superstitions. All men are liable to mistake the superstition of a truth for the truth itself. The English are great in that power of organisation which rises out of commerce. But they have an idea that everything in the world must be subordinated to commerce. The one thing is a truth, the other a superstition. Only by the presence of a strongly contrasted faction, free from the spell of the given prepossession, can the line be safely drawn between truth and falsehood. The English cannot emancipate themselves from their own delusion, though it is easy enough for us to see and smile at it. Similarly we have to cancel out of the national culture all that is merely sectarian or mutually exclusive. Such things are to be relegated to the sphere of personal opinion or ecclesiastical practice. Only that which is to the honour and advantage of both Hindu and Mahomedan, may be spoken by either within the circle of the national life.

Let us look for a moment at how much this covers. First, food-supply and wealth. It needs no argument to prove that abundance of rice, or wheat, abundance of wealth is as much to the good of Mahomedan as of Hindu. The one has as much to gain as the other from social stability, from a widespread amelioration of manners, from industrial revival, from increase of education, from the recovery of national prestige, the establishment of national universities and centres of learning, and from the recapture and development of the Asiatic culture. Whether a man buttons his coat to right or to left and bathes at dawn, or midday, are not matters that concern his nationality. But the increase of learning and power of self-direction amongst his own people will benefit the son of Islam as much as the children of the Sanatan Dharma, and what is gained for one is gained for both.

that the moon had risen, that confidence left her. The moon, as it mounted into the sky, shed its light on the woodland tops and the darkness within was suffused with it. The darkness brightened, and here and there, through gaps, the outer luminousness found its way inside and peeped into the thickets. The higher the moon mounted, the more the light penetrated into the reaches of foliage, the deeper all the shadows took refuge in the thicker parts of the forest. Kalyani too with her child hid herself farther and farther in where the shadows retreated. And now the robbers shouted higher and began to come running from all sides, and the child in her terror wept louder. Kalyani then gave up the struggle and made no farther attempt to escape. She sat down with the girl on her lap on a grassy thornless spot at the foot of a great tree and called repeatedly "Where art Thou? Thou whom I worship daily, to whom daily I bow down, in reliance on whom I had the strength to penetrate into this forest where art Thou, O Madhusudan?" At this time, what with fear, the deep emotion of spiritual love and worship and the lassitude of hunger and thirst, Kalyani gradually lost sense of her outward surroundings and became full of an inward consciousness in which she was aware of a heavenly voice singing in mid-air,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!
O Gopal, O Govinda, O Mukunda, O Shauri!
O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Kalyani had heard from her childhood, in the recitation of the Puranas, that the sages of Paradise roam the world on the paths of the sky, crying aloud to the music of the harp the name of Hari. That imagination took shape in her mind and she began to see with the inner vision a mighty ascetic, harp in hand, whitebodied, whitehaired, whitebearded, whiterobed, tall of stature, singing in the path of the azure heavens.

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Gradually the song grew nearer, louder she heard the words,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Then still nearer, still clearer,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

At last over Kalyani's head the chant rang echoing in the woodland,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Then Kalyani opened her eyes. In the half-lustrous moonbeams suffused and shadowed with the darkness of the forest, she saw in front of her that whitebodied, whitehaired, whitebearded, whiterobed image of a sage. Dreamily all her consciousness centred on the vision. Kalyani thought to bow down to it, but she could not perform the salutation; even as she bent her head, all consciousness left her and she lay fallen supine on the ground.

THE SITUATION II. (BY SJ. BEPIN CHANDRA PAL.)

IN my last letter I discussed the present situation at some length, and tried to indicate what seems to be the line of work we should follow at the present juncture. This work, as I said, will have to follow two parallel lines, one in India and the other in England.

As regards the work in India, there will not be any difference of opinion among the general body of Nationalists in the country. It is, in fact, being done so far as existing conditions allow, by Nationalist workers, more or less in every province. I do not know how far it is feasible, but an attempt should be made, in any case to organise an all India Nationalist Association, with the object of consolidating the party of peaceful and lawful self-reliant activities in the country. The decisions of such a body will be accepted as binding on them by the Nationalists all over India, and it will be able to exercise some amount of disciplinary control on the impatient and impulsive workers in the Nationalist Cause. Such an organisation will save us from being mixed up with either of the two schools of physical force in the country, one advocating its application from the side of the Government, and the other preaching it from the side of the people. It will openly differentiate the lawful and peaceful passive resister from the party of political violence on either side. This differentiation is of the utmost importance at the present moment. It alone will be able, if anything can, to put a check on the suicidal propaganda of political violence, which is finding such ready excuses to the Government to continue and strengthen their present repressive policy. Indeed, nothing else will be able to check it. Mr. Gokhale's receipt will, if anything, strengthen anarchy by increasing repression. Mr. Shyamji Krishna-varma actually wants repression, and is distinctly finding the justification for Mr. Gokhale's policy of stern and relentless repression which the Nationalist leaders always refused to furnish. By a strange irony of fate Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Krishna-varma have found in each other exceedingly useful allies in helping forward the propaganda of political violence in India. Both in their own way are rendering incalculable service to the Indian Bureaucrat worried to death by the patient and plodding ways of the implacable passive resister, and eager to get through the whole business as quickly as possible. And we want a strong organisation to fight this strange dual alliance.

But there is an internal need of it also. Without an organisation able to guide and control the general body of Nationalist in the country, and lead all our activities along peaceful and lawful lines, the whole movement will inevitably split up into small and eccentric groups working frequently at cross purposes.

How to bring about such an organisation, is not, perhaps a very easy question now. But we are in a difficult position, and we shall have to work against terrible odds, whatever we may have to do. Nor is it necessary to have an elaborate organisation. All that is needed now, is have a Register of all nationalists who are willing to pledge themselves to the line of lawful activities laid down in Srijiut Aurovinda Ghosh's Open Letter, and submit to the discipline of their own men, elected by them, to form a Central Executive Committee. No itenary, no meetings, no public demonstrations, nothing of an elaborate nature is necessary to complete such a Register and elect such a Committee. We know who are the leading Nationalists in different centres, and they may well collect the names of the Nationalists in their own localities. The organisation of the Central Committee also will not be difficult after those registers are collected. All that is needed is for two or three men, commanding the confidence of the people, to set to work about it, to draw up a well-considered Memorandum of Association, and then circulate it among leading Nationalists in the different provinces. When these are collected, we shall have the Register we want, and the Register will practically form our Association. All that will be necessary after this, will be for the Executive Committee to send out Circulars pointing out the duty of the party, in reference to particular measures or situation, as these arise from time to time. This is, it seems to me, our immediate work at home.

The second part of our work as suggested in my last letter should be the organisation of a Bureau authorised to represent our Party in England. At present we are not a party, but only a school of thought. The compilation of the Register suggested above will give us the status of a party; and then our British Bureau will have authority of our party behind it. Till then it must content to speak and act on behalf of the Nationalist School only. There is at present, I am afraid, a considerable amount of silent opposition among our people, to any work of this kind. It is largely due to a very natural reaction against the mendicant policy of the old Congress school, and people do not seem to understand how our work can be different from that of the British Congress Committee. At one time we had an excessive and unreasonnable faith in British character; we honestly believed that England was in India primarily for our and not for her own good. That idea has been completely killed now. Even Englishmen themselves do no longer profess any such altruistic motives. And the pendulum has consequently swung to the other extreme. A deep and unreasonnable distrust has replaced the old unquestioning trust in British character and policy, in the popular mind in India. This distrust has not only affected people's estimates of the British people, but really of modern culture and humanity. This distrust is not only characteristic of those that are called Extremists, but equally also of those that are landed as moderates. Mr. Gokhale and his party have no more confidence in the larger humanity and civilisation of our time, than the crude politician who calls political murder as natural justice. It is therefore that both these classes are equally ranged against the real Nationalist programme of peaceful and lawful self-reliant activities.

The truth however lies between the old unreasonnable trust and the present equally unreasonnable distrust. The appeal of old Congress was to what they called the British Conscience. Unfortunately however, the British conscience to which our Moderate friends have so long appeared is not the real thing, but, only an abstraction borrowed from school-standards on Ethics. They ignored the real British Conscience, and wanted really, to create one for England,—endow the British people, through the magic of their speeches, with a new organ, that coming into being or consciousness, would give them, like a fairy God Mother, all they longed for—high appointments enlarged Councils, Colonial Institutions and all. This was their mistake. But because the British have not exact organ that would suit us most, it is not reasonable to think that they are entirely devoid of the moral faculty.

EDUCATION OF WOMEN.

The more we feel that our women must be educated, the more convinced we become that this must be done by ourselves. We cannot longer submit to the disgrace of depending on the missionaries for so essential a service. That it is essential, all are agreed. Without some preparation in reading and writing, how are our wives and sisters to enter into the new ideas with which Bengal to-day is seething? Without some new training of faculty, some fresh development of executive ability, how are they to meet all those new demands with which each year of their lives is likely to confront them?

Very simple schools will do, however. Only to read and write, and know how to sew and count, and acquire the habits and instincts of a gentlewoman are accomplishments sufficient for a girl of twelve. If she has these elements, added to the sound qualifications of a good Hindu home, there is nothing that the husband cannot do, with a little labour and sympathy, after marriage. The material is then ready. He has only to apply the light of ideas, and the torch at once flames up.

What we need is to institute on behalf of our girls something like our old pathshala system. We ought to have little neighbourhood-schools in every direction, where women of good birth and antecedents, who need an income, will teach the little girls of their para the necessary elements. It is important that these Schoolmistresses should themselves be well-born and bred, for we cannot afford to let our children learn to read and write, at cost of becoming vulgarised in thought and manner, or losing the ancient idealism of our race.

The school kept by Nagendra Nandini Devi, at 14 Kartik Boses Lane, is an instance in point. Forty little girls attend this school and receive the rudiments of an education there, at the same time that they enter into a strong living tradition, with regard to all that is highest and best in the life of our motherland. For the last eighteen months, this school has been maintained as a branch, by Sister Christina of the Vivekananda School. Allowing the modest sum of fifteen rupees a month for the head-mistress, herself, the expenses amount to thirty rupees per month. This output can no longer be borne by the Vivekananda School, since its own expenses are constantly increasing. It has carried the undertaking through the purely experimental stage, and enabled Nagendra Nandini Devi to prove her value to her neighbourhood. Is it possible, now, to find those who will contribute to prolong the life of this school for girls, as a first step in a wide-spread movement of the kind?

Contributions to the work of Nagendra Nandini Devi, may be sent to the Sister Christina,—17 Bose Para Lane, Bagh Bazar—by whom they will be gratefully acknowledged.

THE CONVENTION CONGRESS.

A meeting of the Reception Committee took place at Lahore on the 20th September to elect the President of the Congress. The Hon'ble Mr. Harkishen Lal, presiding. The Secretary explained that all Provincial Committees, except Bengal and Burma, nominated Sir Pherozshah. Burma recommended Hon'ble Mr. Khare while Bengal recommended Nawab Mahomed who has expressed his unwillingness. Subsequently they found it stated in news-papers that Bengal recommended Babu Surendranath Banerjee and he received a private letter from the Bengal Provincial Committee intimating its nomination of Babu Surendranath Banerjee as President of the Congress.

The recommendations of the Provincial Committees were considered. The Punjab, Madras, the United Provinces, Berar and Bombay recommended Sir Pherozshah's election. The Central Provinces and Behar gave his name first in alternative groups. The Reception Committee resolved that the recommendation of the Majority of the Provincial Committees be adopted and elected Sir Pherozshah Mehta, President of this year's Congress.

SWADESHI MEETING AT BARISAL.

On the 20th September a big Swadeshi meeting was held in Raja Bahadur's Haveli under the presidency of Babu Upendra Nath Sen Rai-Chowdhuri, Zemindar. The proceedings commenced with the song Mayer daw mota Kapur matha toly nere bhai. Then Babu Baroda Kanto Banerjee, B. L. gave his impressions of the Hugly Provincial Conference, specially, emphasizing the need for union amongst the parties and the use of Swadeshi cloth manufactured at the Banga Lakshmi Cotton Mills, even when made of coarser yarn. Next Babu Sricharan Sen pleader, spoke feelingly on the Swadeshi movement and urged the audience to keep up the movement and use only the Banga Lakshmi Mill cloths. Dilating on the demoralisation that has set on amongst the shopkeepers and the false notion about the Swadeshi by using English yarn made cloth. In conclusion he appealed in the name of Babu Aswini Kumar and Satish Chandra to remain firm to the vow for which they are suffering so much in silence. The audience accepted this portion of the speech with expressions of assurance. The president spoke in the same strain and made a pathetic appeal. The proceedings closed with the song nijna se Brata palane birata hayo nabhaio Jananilashit gon, and loud shouts of Bande Mataram.

THE HOUSE SEARCHES.

A correspondent writes:—At Sherpur, a village under the Rayna Thana, in the Burdwan District on the 10th September two house searches were made—one in the house of Babu Karali Charan Daw and the other in the house of Babu Bama Charan Daw by the Police Sub-Inspector of Rayna with two constables having search warrants issued by the District Magistrate. Nothing incriminating was found.

COTTON EXPERIMENTS.—

The experiments made in Sind with American cotton have turned out exceedingly well. These experiments are not to be confounded with the efforts to acclimatise Egyptian cotton, the American variety being much finer.

REAPPEARANCE OF THE "BANDE MATARAM."

The "Bande Mataram" has reappeared in a new form in Geneva. It contains a bitter attack on Messrs. Banerjee and Gokhale and other prominent leaders of the Indian National Congress.

MIDNAPUR BOMB OFFSHOOT.

The "Patrika" understands that Babu Peary Mohan Dass of Midnapur who was arrested and put into hafiz in connection with the Bomb case, has served notices on Mr. Weston, Mouvi Mazhar-ul-Huk Deputy Superintendent and Inspector Lal Mohan Guha, intimating, his intention of bringing suits for damages against them, claiming Rs. 10,000 from each. Babu Peary Mohan is the father of Santosh Dass, and is a retired Sub-Registrar.

AN IRISH PLACARD.—

Captain Craig, an Ulster Unionist, asked Mr. Burrell in the British House of Commons whether his attention had been drawn to the fact that placards had been extensively posted throughout certain parts of Ireland to the effect that Ireland honoured O'Donoghue who was proud to lay down his life for the cause of his country, and whether the police had discovered the authors of the placards praising a murderer, and if so had any arrests been made.

The Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Cherry, in reply said:—I am informed by the police authorities that a number of such placards were found posted in various parts of Ireland and were at once torn down by the police. The authors have not so far been discovered nor have any arrests been made.

Captain Craig: Has the right hon. gentleman seen one of these placards himself.

Mr. Cherry: No, sir I have not. Captain Craig amid cries of 'Order' here held up a placard with a deep black border and handed it to the Front Opposition bench where it was examined by several members.

Mr. Macveagh asked whether the right hon. gentleman had heard that these placards were posted by an organization which printed placards on Grievances from Ireland.

THE PAKHJUNGPOUR SENSATION.—

Two brothers, Sarat Chandra and Dharendra Chandra Chatterjee of Patejurgpur, aged 15 and 17, were arrested in connection with the alleged contemplated dacoity at Bhojeshwar in September, 1908. This fresh wild goose chase is evidently started on the statement that Chandra Chatterjee of Surat far who has turned an approver in the Dacca Stabbling Case, and is now the guest of the Government at Dacca, enjoying a monthly allowance of Rs. 65, with a launch and green boat for river trips. Two witnesses were produced yesterday. They failed to identify either of the accused. The Public have great confidence in Mr. Donald, who is not likely to be easily duped.

MR. GOKHALE ON THE ROOT OF THE TROUBLE.—

At the meeting to protest against the treatment of the Transvaal Indians held at Bombay on the 14th September Mr. Gokhale, proposing the first resolution, outlined the principal facts of the struggle in South Africa. He said that in the circumstances of the Transvaal passive resistance such as that organised by Mr. Ghandi was not only legitimate but was a duty resting on all self-respecting persons. He said "If we strongly and clearly and conscientiously feel the grave injustice of a law and there is no other way to obtain redress, I think refusal to acquiesce in it, and taking the consequence of such refusal, is the only course left to those who place conscience and self-respect above their material or immediate interests." He urged that the Government of India should retaliate by withdrawing authority for recruitment of indentured labour for Natal which colony is a vulnerable point of union from the Indian standpoint. He concluded by saying: "The root of our present troubles in the colonies really lies in the fact that our status is not what it should be in our own country. Men who have no satisfactory status in their own land cannot expect to have a satisfactory status elsewhere. Our struggle for equal treatment with Englishmen in the Empire must, therefore, be mainly carried on in India itself. Then, again, we must remember that it is bound to be a long and weary struggle. It will require again and again sacrifices and sufferings such as those of our Transvaal brethren, and it will bring us repeated failures before we achieve final success. But suffering or no suffering, failure or success, we owe it to our motherland to carry on this struggle with stout hearts and full faith in the justice of our cause."

AN INDUSTRIAL CONCERN.—

A general meeting of the share-holders of the Jessore Comb, Button and Mat Manufacturing Co. Ltd., was held in the registered office of the Company on the 12th last when office-bearers for the current year were appointed:—

It was decided in that meeting to erect a shed for the factory and to begin work on a regular scale before the ensuing puja holidays. The work of the factory has already been commenced in a hired house with one complete set of comb-making machinery and 4 set of looms for manufacturing ornamented mats. The expert of the Company brought these machineries along with others from Japan. Mr. Ghose who had been in Japan for three years and studied the above manufactures, made a special study of managing factories there. He has begun work here strictly on Japanese principles, i. e., the principles of co-operation. In order to make the work interesting and attractive to the operatives Mr. Ghose has set aside certain number of shares of the Company exclusively for the officers and operatives.

TRANSVAAL INDIANS.—

A public meeting was held at Bombay on the 14th September to consider the question of the treatment of Indians in the Transvaal and to appeal once again to His Majesty's Ministers and the British Parliament to do all in their power to prevent the continued injustice and ill-treatment to His Majesty's Indian subject in the Transvaal. For several days past appeals have been made to the public to attend the meeting in large numbers so as to make an effective demonstration. In consequence the Town Hall was crowded in all parts, including the verandah, which was thronged by a large concourse of people.

Speakers had been chosen to represent the various communities of the city, while several Indians who have resided in South Africa spoke from their own experience of the condition of affairs. The proceedings were conducted with great enthusiasm, and lasted for about two hours. Sir Karmabhoy Ibrahim presided and in the course of his speech said:—You are aware of the circumstances under which the meeting called by the Sheriff on the 31st August last was cancelled. The abrupt cancellation called forth a display of feeling which has happily been allayed by a Press communique in which the Government have, with a candour and promptitude which deserve our acknowledgement, expressed their regret for the inconvenience caused to the public. Nothing more need be said, therefore on that point. As regards the larger question of the Sheriff's position and the duties with which the communique deals, I am sure that the Government view is correct. I believe that there are precedents which conflict with the Government view. However, this is not proper occasion to enter into that question which needs to be examined and dealt with separately.

A SUB-INSPECTOR CENSURED.

The Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya asked the following question at the last meeting of the U. P. Council at Nainital: "Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the conduct of the sub-Inspector of Police who insisted on being present at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Tax-payer's Association which was going to be held at the Christ Church College, at Cawnpore, and who did not leave the premises on being asked to do so? Will the Government be pleased to state what action it has taken in the matter?" The Hon. Mr. Holmes replied:—"The attention of the Government has been drawn to the matter. The Sub-Inspector was not acting under the authority of any superior officer, and the District Magistrate of Cawnpore at the time expressed his regret for the ill-considered action of the sub-Inspector to the Vice-Chairman of the Tax payer's Association. The sub-Inspector has been censured."

POLICE ESPIONAGE.

At the last meeting of the United Provinces Legislative Council the Hon'ble Pandit M. M. Malaviya asked: "Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the complaints that have been published in the papers regarding the action of the police in watching the house of Dr. Tej. Bahadur Sapru, Advocate, High Court, at Allahabad, during the time when Mr. Devadhar, of the Servants of India Society, was putting up with him and also of their action in subjecting Mr. Devadhar in many places to a close and irritating espionage during his tour in these provinces? Will the Government be pleased to state what action it has taken in the matter?" The Hon. Mr. Holmes replied: "The attention of the Government has been drawn to the complaints referred to. The Lieutenant-Governor is of opinion that the police exceeded their duties in the instance in question, and steps have been taken by the Government in order to prevent similar excesses in future."

A KRISHNAVARMA LETTER.

The "Daily Express" publishes a letter from Mr. Krishnavarma replying to the statement that he composed the alleged statement by Dhinra. Krishnavarma asks if the "Daily Express" can produce an iota of evidence to show that he had anything to do with either the composition or the publication of that document. "It is," he says, preposterous to father on me the publication of every so-called seditious leaflet referring to India which emanates from Paris or which finds its way into England or other parts of the British Empire." He described as "scurrilous the imputation of the 'Daily Express' that Indian seditious are beginning to regard him as nothing more than a spy."

"THE NEW AGE."

In the British Houses of Commons Earl Winterton asked the Attorney General if this attention had been called to an article in the "New Age," for Aug. 26, in which the murder of Sir Curzon-Wyllie was partially condoned and in which an Indian Lieutenant-Governor was accused of deliberately carrying out an illegal execution, and if he proposed to take any proceedings. The Attorney-General: I have seen the article in question and I do not propose to take any proceedings.

Earl Winterton: Is the right hon. gentleman aware that the article suggested that a Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal carried out an illegal execution?

The Attorney-General; I do not think the suggestion is as explicit as the noble Lord puts it.

Mr. Macnail: Is the right hon. gentleman in want of an amateur Crown Prosecutor?

RAILWAY CASE AT SEALDAH.

On Monday before Mr. N. L. Bagchi, Deputy Magistrate of Sealdah, an up-countryman, named Chunilal Khetri, was charged as a suspicious character. The prosecution alleged that the accused had just been released from gaol and was found travelling in an Up train to Goalando station with a bag. The accused who was known to a constable was suspected at the Dum-Dum station and was arrested. The Court thereupon inquired and was apprised of that the accused had been arrested under section 187 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The Magistrate on reading the section said:—"I must have the law strictly followed where are the copies of the entries in the diary?" What are your grounds for suspecting the accused? Simply because he was released just then from jail and was travelling in a train? The accused might have been looking for a job you ought to have given him time." The Inspector informed the Court that nothing further incriminating evidence was found against the man, and he was unable to furnish the Court with the copies of entries at present. The court thereupon remarked saying:—"Well I am afraid I shall have to refer the matter to the Inspector-General of Police and will tell him that the copies of entries were not produced before me." Inspector: We beg to apply for a remand, sir, as the inquiries are not yet complete. Court:—Well, you have already kept the man for three days in custody.

BENGAL SWADESHI: A REVIVAL OF INDUSTRIES AND COMMERCE.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY.

EARLY in the year 1906 we noticed in the whole of Bengal only 10 Cotton Mills, four of which alone belonged to Indian Capitalists, namely, (1) Luxmi Tulsii Mills, Serampore, (2) Ramdayal Cotton Mills, (3) Empress India Cotton Mills Company and (4) Victoria Cotton Mills. But since the inauguration of the Swadeshi Movement some four Cotton Mills Companies have been or are going to be started, of which the first and foremost is (1) The Bengal Luxmi Cotton Mills Ltd., the old Tulsii Mills reorganised and extended under Bengali management, which has a paid-up Capital of rupees 18 lakhs and which paid a dividend of 5 per cent. last year. The other Cotton Mills are (2) the Mohini Mills Limited, established at Kushtia with a Capital of a lakh and a half, (3) The Ganesh Cloth Mills Co. Ltd., very shortly to be established near the railway station of Lilooah, with a Capital of 5 lakhs of rupees and (4) The Oriental Jute and Cotton Mills Co. Ltd. formed with a Capital of 20 lakhs of rupees to start and conduct jute and Cotton Mills in or outside Calcutta.

The woven goods produced in Bengal during the last three years are as follows:—25 million yards, in 1906-06, 5.8 million yards in 1906-07, and 7.9 million yards in 1907-08. The first figure is for greys alone, the latter two are for all woven goods. This shows there has been a marvellous development in the output of woven goods and here we have the opinion of Mr J. G. Cumming, B. A. I. C. S., at present Commissioner of the Presidency Division, who had been appointed "On Special Duty, Industrial Inquiries" of the province. On page 7, part II of his valuable Report Mr. Cumming says "As for factory weaving it has received an impetus from the Swadeshi movement."

COTTAGE WEAVING

It is now admitted almost on all hands that since the days of the East India Company, the weaving class, the Tantia (Hindu), Jugis (Hindu) and the Jolaha (Mahomedan) had been turning to day-labourers day by day, first, on account of the repression at the hands of the early rulers followed by free influx of British-made cloths, and secondly, owing to the consequent want of demand for their manufactures. From the census report of 1901 it would appear that the total number of the weaving population of United Bengal still engaged in the industry was 1, 124, 870, and this again considerably decreased in the years following. But since the inauguration of the Swadeshi Movement these helpless people have found an opening for their livelihood and have been induced to return to their old hereditary profession.

The opinion of Mr. Cumming on hand-weaving are as follows:—

" * * * By 1901 it was started that the competition of European piece-goods was lowering the indigenous in the Burdwan Presidency and the Patna Division, but that the fly-shuttle loom was coming into use in the two former areas. . . . By 1906-07, the industry had recovered. In Burdwan District there was an increase in outturn of one-half over that of the previous year. From Bankura there was an export trade. At Bolpur in Beerbhoom there was considerable manufacture. In Hooghly district the manufactures in Arambagh sub-division rose from 11 lakhs to 14 lakhs. In Howrah the mill outturn decreased, and the hand outturn increased. In Midnapore, Ghatal was the centre of weaving. In the 24-Parganas the mill market was dull; the hand outturn shortened in Basirhat subdivision. In Jessore there was a considerable manufacture in both coarse and fine cloth; so also in Khulna. In Nadia coarse cloths, bed-sheets and towels were made at Santipur for export. In Patna, both cotton and mixed fabrics were manufactured in Bihar. In Saran district, the Jolahas wove a coarse cloth for winter use. There was some spinning in the Gopalganj sub-division. In Gaya, there was coarse cloth manufacture. In Darbhanga district there was the special kolti cloth woven near Madhubani, and kani cloth at Bhagalpur, coarse cloth was made but an improvement in texture was made; so also in Monghyr. In the Sonthal Parganas, both jalahas, tantis and aboriginals did coarse weaving. At Kishanganj in Purnea district, lungis and patanis were made. Throughout Orissa and Chota-Nagpur Divisions coarse cloths were woven, practically for local consumption. A comparison between this account and the earlier accounts show what a revolution for the time being has been made in the industry by the new factor of an increased local demand.

The following lines from the recent Report of Mr. J. N. Gupta who was put on special duty to inquire into the present condition of the indigenous industries in Eastern Bengal and Assam throw the same light on the subject.

"It looks, however," goes on Mr. Gupta to say, "as if the downward course taken by this, the most important indigenous industry of the province, has at last been checked, and a slow but perceptible improvement is visible everywhere. Mr. Cunningham, in his recent report remarks, 'The Swadeshi movement of the last two years is a new factor stimulating production and creating a demand. I find that this has led to the improvement of the weavers in parts of the Presidency and Burdwan Divisions, that is to say, many weavers who had given up their caste occupation have returned to it.' The same phenomenon has also been noticed in Madras by Mr. Chatterton, who says, 'The interest in hand-weaving is mainly due to the Swadeshi movement, and most of the hand-weaving factories owe their existence to the enthusiasm engendered at the birth of a new political movement.' It is fortunate that a similar revival of the hand-loom weaving industry is also noticeable in the principal centres of the weaving industry in East Bengal. There are no reliable figures, however, to show what the real increase in the volume of this industry has been, but figures for the import of foreign and Indian cotton piece-goods and yarn taken from the Divisional reports throw some light on the point. From the figures it would appear—

(1) That in the Dacca and Chittagong Divisions, the import of European goods greatly diminished in 1906-07; whereas a similar decline was prominently noticeable in Rajshahi Divisions, in 1906.

(2) The import of yarn, though fluctuating, also showed a market increase, specially in 1904-05 when the total import of yarn, Indian and foreign, was 20,000 maunds in excess of the imports in 1902-03. The increase in the imports of Indian yarn was specially noticeable in Chittagong; it rose from 250 maunds in 1902-03, to 3,674 maunds in 1906-07.

From the report on the trade of this province in 1905-07, it would appear that 5,25,043 maunds of cotton piece-goods were imported into Eastern Bengal districts of the province, whereas 1,31,219 maunds of yarn were imported in the same year. It would thus appear that at least one-fourth of the total demand for cotton fabrics was supplied by the hand-looms.

EXPANSION IN BRANCHES.

Taking individual districts, we find that the development has been the greatest in those districts which have been able to supply any expanding demand for any special class of goods. For instance, the industry seems to have progressed most in Noakhali, Comilla, Pabna, and Faridpur. All these districts, besides producing the usual salis and dhutis turned out a very large quantity of check and chutis, both thick and thin, and suitable for the making of coats, shirts, of the wearing apparel most in vogue now. In Comilla the increase is reported to be fully 32 per cent.; for whereas the total export of the cloth from that district to other parts of Bengal amounted hardly to a lakh of rupees before, now the exports come to over a lakh and a half. I myself went to the Thursday hat at Comilla, and found that stuff valued at 200 rupees at least was brought up chiefly for export. There are two such seats in a week at Comilla itself.

In the divisional report of Rajshahi for 1906-07 the following occurs: "The Collector of Pabna reports that cotton-weaving has lately received an impetus, and weavers are hardly able to meet the growing demand of the foreign and local markets. It is said that the number of hand-looms has increased in Pabna, and members of the weaving class who had taken to other pursuits have now returned to their caste profession."

In Noakhali it was found that the import of European cotton piece goods has gradually fallen off from 2,856 bales in 1905-06 to 942 bales in 1907-08, whereas that of the Indian piece goods had gradually increased from 453 bales in 1905-06 to 1,633 bales in 1907-08. The export of locally manufactured cloth also greatly increased during this period till it reached 720 maunds in 1906, though it fell off again to 380 maunds in 1907.

It would thus appear that the textile manufactures of Bengal have been greatly increased, and they have got such a large home consumption that the foreign piece-goods trade of Bengal have come to a grave crisis.

LUCKY DAY SALES

To show how far the affairs stood for the worse we simply quote the following from an article entitled "Piece Goods Trade: The Present Depression" appearing in the well-known Anglo-Indian Daily of Statesman of October, 13, 1908. "There does not seem," goes on the Anglo-Indian Organ to say, "to be much room for doubt that the piece-goods trade in India has now reached a critical period in its history. Last Monday was the well-known Lucky Day on which Marwari traders are wont to enter into large forward contracts, believing it to be a really lucky day for commencing their speculations and merchants usually book orders for thousands of packages, the average being something between 40,000 and 50,000 cases but the sales effected on Monday were exceedingly poor and for all practical purposes the success of Lucky Day sales must be regarded as a failure. It has been an open secret that this class of goods has scarcely moved at all and that there has been an enormous overstock during the last two years.

Several causes have conspired to make it exceedingly difficult for most persons engaged in the trade to come out of the business without at any rate having to meet heavy losses. As might have been expected, some traders have been already forced into the Insolvency Court at least one of them being a big holder of stock, and it is feared that the next month or two will find a number of other firms in the hands of the Official Assignee. On the top of * * * some more or less large recent insolvencies of this sort comes the adjudication of Messrs. Showdass Biswas-sar Dass * * * Yet another application of the kind, of which, it is said, there is a regular crop almost ready to be placed before the Court was heard by Mr. Justice Sharfuddin yesterday. In this matter Babu Charu Chandra Bose applied on behalf of his clients, Chotay Lal Luchminarain, for an order of adjudication under section 9 of the Act, against Messrs Tolaram Shamshuk, the principal proprietor of which is Lunkaram. * * *

It is thus evident from the above facts and opinions of the Anglo-Indian Daily that foreign piece-goods trade of Bengal has been at a stake for the last few years, and consequently native piece-goods trade has become one of successful concerns of the day in the United Bengal.

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known to every civilised world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilised languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all, and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties, religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI PARVA of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvas.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER of Bhishma is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS, THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED, lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST, SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basisath is great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika Philosophy. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy. The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2.8. REDUCED to Rs. 1.8. Postage Extra.

BRAHMACHYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

BY

Sr. RAMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVATTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras;—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon)—"Bramacharyya describes the life which Brahmachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. I. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Rump Presidential Election.

The Lahore Special Correspondent of the Rashtra Mat telegraphs to his paper a story of the proceedings at the Presidential election for the Rump Congress at Lahore, which, if correct, sheds a singular light on the proceedings of the valiant Three who are defending the bridge of conciliation and alliance between the bureaucracy and the Moderates which now goes by the name of the Indian National Congress. According to this correspondent, the account of Sir Pherozshah's election cabled from Lahore is incorrect and garbled. What really happened was that eighteen gentlemen assembled at Lahore as the Reception Committee, of whom more than half were employees of Mr. Harkissen Lal's various commercial ventures. This independent majority voted plump for Mr Harkissen Lal's candidate, Sir Pherozshah, but the rest were strong and firm for Sj Surendranath Banerji. This revolt in the camp led to much anxiety and confusion and great efforts were made to bring back the insurgents to their allegiance, but in vain. If this account is correct, no criticism can be too strong for the misrepresentation which suppressed the facts of the election. Was it not circulated that Sir Pherozshah would not accept the Presidentship unless it were offered unanimously? A strenuous attempt was made to save the face of the Dictator by representing in the Lahore cables that the nomination of Sj Surendranath by the Bengal Convention Committee was only a suggestion in a private letter. But even then, what of Burma? What of this remarkable division in the toy committee itself at Lahore? We imagine that the Lion will put his dignity in his pocket or in his mane or any other hiding place that may be handy and accept the Presidentship; and if he does, we also imagine that he will roar discreetly at Lahore about the touching and unanimous confidence placed in him and the imperative voice of the whole country calling him to fill this great and responsible position of a Rump President! We have a suggestion for our highly esteemed Lion. Why not save his dignity and effect his object by appointing some lieutenant like Mr Wacha as President? In that case Sir Pherozshah would be as much President in fact as if he enjoyed the doubtful and mutilated honours of the Rump Presidentship.

Nation-stuff in Morocco.

The Powers of Europe are highly indignant at the tortures and mutilations practised by Mulai Hamid on his vanquished rival, El Roghi, and his captured adherents. There is no doubt that the savage outbreak of mediæval and African savagery of which the Moorish Sultan has been guilty, is revolting and deprives him personally of all claim to sympathy; but European moral indignation in the matter seems to us to be out of place when we remember the tortures practised by American troops on Filipinos (to say nothing of the ghastly details of lynching in the Southern States,) and the unbridled atrocities of the European armies in China. Be that as it may, we come across a remarkable account, extracted in the Indian Daily News, of the stuff of which the Moorish people are made. The narrator is Belton, the Englishman who commanded the Sultan's army and has resigned his post as a protest against the Sultan's primitive method of treating political prisoners. Death and mutilation seem to have been the punishments inflicted. Belton narrates that twenty-officers of El Roghi had their right hands cut off and then seared, according to the barbarous old surgical fashion, in a cauldron of boiling oil to stop the bleeding. Not from one of these men, reports the English soldier with wonder, did there come, all the time, a single whimper. And he goes on to tell how one of them, after the mutilation, quietly walked over to the fire where the cauldron was boiling, and, while his stump was being plunged in the boiling liquid, lighted from the flame with the utmost serenity a cigarette he held in his hand. Whatever may be the present backwardness of the Moors and the carelessness to light of their tribes, there is the stuff of a strong, warlike and princely nation in the land which gave birth to these iron men. If ever the wave of Egyptian Neo-Islam and Mahomedan Nationalism sweeps across Morocco, Europe will have to reckon with no mean or contemptible people in the North West of Africa.

Cook versus Peary.

It is with a somewhat sardonic sense of humour that we in India, when that eminently truthful diplomat, Lord Curzon, once had the boldness to lecture on our mendacity and the superior truth of the Occidental, have watched the vulgar squabble between Dr. Cook and Commander Peary about the discovery of the North Pole. Long ago, most of the romance and mystery had gone out of the search for the Pole. The quest, though still extremely difficult and even perilous to an incautious adventurer, had no longer the charm of those gigantic dangers which met and slew the old explorers. It was known besides that little was likely to reward the man who succeeded, and there was small chance of anything but ice and cold being discovered at the North Pole. What little of the interesting and poetic was left in the idea, has now gone out of it for ever, and only a sense of nausea is left behind, as the controversy develops and leaves one with a feeling that it would have been better if the goal of so many heroic sacrifices had been left undiscovered for all time, rather than that it should have been discovered in this way. The spectacle of two distinguished explorers, one, we suppose from his title, an American naval officer and the other a savant not unknown to fame, hurrying at each other such epithets as liar and faker, accusing each other of vile and dishonourable conduct, advancing evidence that when examined melts into thin air, citing witnesses who, when questioned, give them the lie, while all Europe and America join and take sides in the disgusting wrangle, is one that ought to give pause to the blindest admirer of Western civilisation and believer in Western superiority. We certainly will not imitate the general run of European writers who, arguing sinugly from temporary, local or individual circumstances, talk, in the style of self-satisfied arrogance, of Oriental barbarity, Oriental treachery and mendacity, Oriental unscrupulousness; we will not say that the continents of Europe and America are peopled by nations of highly civilized liars, impostors and fakers of evidence without any sense of truth, honour or dignity, although we have as good cause as any Western critic of Asia; but at any rate the legend of European superiority and the inferior morals of the Asiatic has, by this time, been so badly damaged that we think even the Englishman might think twice before it bases its opposition to national aspirations on the pretensions of the Pharisee. It is evident that we are as good as the Europeans; we think we are in most respects better; we certainly could not be worse.

NATIONALIST ORGANISATION.

THE time has now come when it is imperative in the interests of the Nationalist party that its forces should be organised for united deliberation and effective work. A great deal depends on the care and foresight with which the character and methods of the organisation are elaborated at the beginning, for any mistake now may mean trouble and temporary disorganisation hereafter. It is not the easy problem of providing instruments for the working of a set of political ideas in a country where political thought has always been clear and definite and no repressive laws or police harassment can be directed against the dissemination of just political ideals and lawful political activities. We have to face the jealousy, suspicion and hostility of an all-powerful vested interest which it is our avowed object to replace by Indian agencies, the opposition, not always over-nice in its methods, of a rich and influential section of our own countrymen, and the vagueness of thought and indecisiveness of action common to the great bulk of our people even when they have been deeply touched by Nationalist sentiment and ideals. To form a centre of order, clear full and powerful thought, swift effectiveness, free and orderly deliberation, disciplined and well-planned action must be the object of any organisation that we shall form. Two sets of qualities which ought not to be but often are conflicting, are needed for success; resolute courage, and a frank and faithful adherence to principle on the one side and wariness and policy on the other.

The first mistake we have to avoid is the tendency to perpetuate or imitate old institutions or lines of action which are growing out of date. The Nationalist party is a young and progressive force born of tendencies, aims and necessities which were foreign to the nineteenth century, and, being a party of the future and not of the immediate past, it must look, in all it does and creates, not to the past but to the future. There are still in the party the relics of the old desire to raise up a rival Congress and assert our claim to be part legates of the institution which came to a violent end at Surat. Our claim stands and, if a real Congress is again erected, it must be with the Nationalists within it and not excluded. The strength of the demand in the country for an United Congress is a sufficient vindication of the claim. But if we try still farther to enforce it by holding a rival session and calling it the Congress, we shall take an ill-advised step calculated to weaken us instead of developing our strength. A technical justification may be advanced by inviting men of all shades of opinion to such a session, but as a matter of fact none are likely to attend a session summoned by pronounced Nationalists unless they are pronounced Nationalists themselves. A United Congress can be effectively summoned only if we are able to effect a combination of Nationalists, advanced Moderates and that large section of opinion which, without having pronounced views, are eager to revive a public body in which all opinions can meet and work together for the good of the country. Such a combination would soon reduce Sir Pherozshah's Rump Congress to the lifeless and meagre phantasm which it must in any case become with the lapse of time and the open development of the Mehta-Morley alliance. But to create another Rump Congress on the Nationalist side would be to confound confusion yet worse without any compensating gain. It would moreover throw on the shoulders of the Nationalists a portion of the blame for perpetuating the split, which now rests entirely on the other side.

If a Nationalist Ramp Congress is inadvisable and inconsistent with the dignity of the Nationalist party and its aversion to mere catchwords and shams, an imitation of the forms and working of the old Congress is also inadvisable. We were never satisfied with those forms and that working. The three day's show, the excessively festal aspect of the occasion, the monstrous preponderance of speech and resolution-passing over action and work, the want of true democratic rule and order, the weary waste of formal oratory without any practical use or object, the incapacity of the assembly for grappling with the real problems of our national existence and progress, the anxiety to avoid public discussion which is the lifebreath of democratic politics, these and many other defects made the Congress in our view an instrument ill-made, wasteful of money and energy and the centre of a false conception of political deliberation and action. If we imitate the Congress, we shall contract all the faults of the Congress. Neither can we get any help from the proceedings of the Nationalist Conference which met at Surat, for that was a loose and informal body which only considered certain immediate questions and emergencies arising out of the Surat session. Yet a centre of deliberation and the consideration of past progress and future policy is essential to the building of the Nationalist party into an effective force conscious of and controlling its mission and activities. We shall indicate briefly the main principles on which we think the organisation of such a body should be based.

The first question is of the scope and object of the institution. In the first place, we must avoid the mistake of making it a festival or a show occasion intended to excite enthusiasm and propagate sentiment. That was a function which the Indian National Congress had, perhaps inevitably, to perform, but a body which tries to be at once a deliberative assembly and a national festival must necessarily tend to establish the theatrical and holiday character at the expense of the practical and deliberative. National festivals and days of ceremony are the best means of creating enthusiasm and sentiment; that is the function of occasions like the 7th August and the 16th October, the Sivaji Utsav and similar celebrations. We must resolutely eschew all vestiges of the old festival aspect of our political bodies and make our assembly a severely practical and matter-of-fact body. Secondly, we must clearly recognize that a body meeting once a year cannot be an effective centre of actual yearlong work, it can only be an instrument for deliberation and the determination of policy and a centre of reference for whose consideration and adjudgment the actually accomplished work of the year may, in its main features and the sum of its fulfilment, be submitted. The practical work must be done by quite different organisations, provincial and local, carrying out the policy fixed by the deliberative body but differently constituted; for, as the object of an executive body is entirely different from the object of a deliberative body, so its constitution, rules and procedure must be entirely different. In fact our All-India body must be not a Congress or Conference even, but a Council, and since in spite of Shakespeare and S. J. Baikunthanath Sen, there is much in a name and it largely helps to determine our attitude towards the thing, let us call our body not the Nationalist Congress, Convention or Conference, but the Nationalist Council.

If the body is to be a Council, its dimensions must be of such a character as to be manageable and allow of effective discussion in the short time at our disposal. A spectacular Congress or Conference gains by numbers, a Council is hampered by them. Therefore the maximum number of delegates must be fixed and apportioned to the different parts of the nation according to their numbers. Secondly, in the proceedings themselves all elements of useless ornament and redundancy must be purged out, such as the long Presidential Speech, the Reception Committee, Chairmen's speech and the division of the program into the secret and official parts of the Committee Affairs and the public display of oratory in the full assembly. The first two features are obviously useless for our purpose and a mere waste of valuable time. With the disappearance of the spectacular aspect usually associated with our public bodies, the reason for the mere display of oratory also disappears. The only other utility of the double sitting is that the full assembly forms a Court of Appeal from the decision of the Subjects Committee and an opportunity to the minority for publicly dissenting from any decision by a majority which they might otherwise be supposed to have endorsed. The necessity for the first function arises from the imperfectly representative character of the Subjects Committees as it is at present elected; the necessity for the second function from the absence of publicity in its proceedings. If the whole Council sits as Subject Committee, the necessity for the Court of Appeal or the public assertion of dissent will not occur. The only justification for the existence of the Subject Committee in our present political bodies is their unwieldy proportions, the only reason for its secrecy the attempt to conceal all difficulties in the way of coming to an unanimous conclusion; and neither of these reasons will have any existence in a Nationalist Council. The subjects can be fixed by a small executive body existing throughout the year, which will be in charge of all questions that may arise in connection with the council, subject to approval or censure by the Council itself at its annual meeting. The resolutions on these subjects can be formed in the Council and additional resolutions can be brought forward, if the Council approves. All unnecessary oratory should be avoided and resolutions formulating policy of a standing character can be first got out of the way by a formal motion of them from the Chair. After this preliminary, the Council can go into Committee to consider, approve or amend the report of progress made by the Secretaries for the past year, and, on the second day, resolutions demanding debate and deliberation may be brought in full Council.

The next question is of the date and of ex-Presidents and long-established officials, no looseness of procedure putting a premium on party trickery and unfair rulings. The only body of officials will be two general secretaries and two secretaries for each province, forming the executive body of the Council, who will be for the most part recorders of provincial work and summoners of the Council and will have no power to direct or control its procedure. Instead of an autocratic and influential President we should have a Chairman who will not intervene in the discussion with his views, but confine himself to guiding the deliberations as an administrator of fixed rules of procedure which he will not have the power to depart from, modify or amplify. He must therefore be like the Speaker of the House of Commons, not an active and prominent leader who cannot be spared from the discussion, but a man of some position in the party whose probity and fairness can be universally trusted.

The last question is that of the electorate. We throw out the suggestion that, in the first place, we should cease to be bound by the British provincial units which are the creation of historical circumstances connected with the gradual conquest of India by the English traders, and have no correspondence with the natural divisions of the people, and should adopt divisions which will be favourable to the working out of the Nationalist policy. And since the main work of the party will have to be done through the vernacular, the most natural and convenient divisions will be those of the half dozen or more great literary languages, minor or dialectical tongues of inferior vitality being thrown under the great vernaculars to which they geographically or by kinship belong. It was the programme of the Nationalist party in Bengal to create a register of voters throughout the country, who could form a real electorate. Such a conception would have been impracticable in the old days when the people at large took no active part in politics; it was fast approaching the region of practicability when the repressions broke the natural course of our national development and introduced elements of arbitrary interference from above and a feeble and sporadic Terrorist reaction from below, the after-swell of which still disturbs the country. S. J. Bepin Chandra Pal has written advocating the creation of a register of Nationalists, as a basis for organisation. This is, no doubt, the only sound basis for a thoroughly democratic organisation, but so long as the after-swell lasts and the tempest may return, so long as police misrule does not give way to the complete restoration of law and order a register of Nationalists would only be a register of victims for investigators of the Lalunohan and Mazarul Huq type to harass with arrests, house-searches, binding down under securities, prosecutions with no evidence or tainted evidence, and the other weapons which Criminal Procedure and Penal Code supply, and against which there can be no sufficient redress under an autocratic regime not responsible to any popular body, leaning on the police rather than on the people and master of the judiciary. In these circumstances we can only create convenient limited electorates for the election of our council delegates, waiting a more favourable condition of things for democratising the base of our structure.

On these principles we can establish a deliberative body which will give shape, centrality and consistency to Nationalist propaganda and work all over the country. We invite the attention of the leading Nationalist workers throughout India to our suggestion. The proposal has been made to hold a meeting of Nationalists at Calcutta at which a definite scheme and rules may be submitted and, as far as possible, adopted in action so that the work may not be delayed. No United Congress is possible this year, and if or when it comes, the existence of our body which is avowedly a party organisation will not interfere with our joining it.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER V.

IN a huge tract of ground in the forest there was a great monastery engirt with ruined masses of stone. Archaeologists would tell us that this was formerly a monastic retreat of the Buddhists and afterwards became a Hindu monastery. Its rows of edifices were two-storied; in between were temples and in front a meeting-hall. Almost all these buildings were surrounded with a wall and so densely hidden with the trees of the forest that, even at daytime and at a short distance from the place, none could divine the presence of a human habitation here. The buildings were broken in many places, but by daylight one could see that the whole place had been recently repaired. A glance showed that man had made his dwelling in this profound and inaccessible wilderness. It was in a room in this monastery, where a great log was blazing, that Kalyani first returned to consciousness and beheld in front of her that white-bodied, whiterobed Great One. Kalyani began once more to gaze on him with eyes large with wonder, for even now memory did not return to her. Then the Mighty One of Kalyani's vision spoke to her; "My child, this is a habitation of the Gods, here have no apprehension. I have a little milk, drink it and then I will talk with you."

At first Kalyani could understand nothing, then, as by degrees her mind recovered some firm foundation, she threw the hem of her robe round her neck and made an obeisance at the Great One's feet. He replied with a blessing and brought out from another room a sweet-smelling earthen pot in which he warmed some milk at the blazing fire. When the milk was warm he gave it to Kalyani and said, "My child give some to your daughter to drink and then drink some yourself, afterwards you can talk." Kalyani, with joy in her heart, began to administer the milk to her daughter. The unknown then said to her, "While I am absent, have no anxiety," and left the temple. After a while he returned from outside and saw that Kalyani had finished giving the milk to her child, but had herself drunk nothing; the milk was almost as it was at first, very little had been used. "My child" said the unknown, "you have not drunk the milk; I am going out again, and until you drink I will not return."

The sage-like personage was again leaving the room, when Kalyani once more made him an obeisance and stood before him with folded hands.

"What is it you wish to say," asked the recluse.

Then Kalyani replied, "Do not command me to drink the milk, there is an obstacle. I will not drink it."

The recluse answered in a voice full of compassion, "Tell me what is the obstacle; I am a forest-dwelling ascetic, you are my daughter; what can you have to say which you will not tell me? When I carried you unconscious from the forest, you then seemed to me as if you had been sadly distressed with thirst and hunger; if you do not eat and drink, how can you live?"

Kalyani answered, the tears dropping from her eyes, "You are a god and I will tell you. My husband remains still fasting and until I meet him again or hear of his tasting food, how can I eat?"

The ascetic asked, "Where is your husband?"

"I do not know," said Kalyani, "the robbers stole me away after he had gone out in search of milk." Then the ascetic by question after question elicited all the information about Kalyani and her husband. Kalyani did not indeed utter her husband's name,—she could not; but the other information the ascetic received about him was sufficient for him to understand. He asked her, "Then you are Mohendra Singha's wife?" Kalyani, in silence and with bowed head, began to heap wood on the fire at which the milk had been warmed. Then the ascetic said, "Do what I tell you, drink the milk; I am bringing you news of your husband. Unless you drink the milk, I will not go." Kalyani asked, "Is there a little water anywhere here?" The ascetic pointed to a jar of water. Kalyani made a cup of her hands, the ascetic filled it with water; then Kalyani, approaching her hands with the water in them to the ascetic's feet, said "Please put the dust of your feet in the water." When the ascetic had touched the water with his foot, Kalyani drank it and said, "I have drunk nectar of the gods, do not tell me to eat or drink anything else; until I have news of my husband I will take nothing else." The ascetic answered, "Abide without fear in this temple. I am going in search of your husband."

AN EXTRAORDINARY PROHIBITION.

Pandit Bhoje Dutt of Agra has been in our midst for some time, and none had hitherto imagined that he was a political agitator or his preachings dangerous to the public peace. We all knew him as secretary of the Sudhi Samaj, a religious body having for its object the re-admission of converts from Hinduism into the fold of the religion and also, we believe, the admission of converts to Hinduism from other religions into Hindu society with the full status of Hindus. The society has been working for some time with signal success and no breach of the law or the peace. Yet the other day Mr Swinhoe thought fit to prohibit the Pandit from lecturing in Calcutta and the public from attending his lectures for the space of two months. We reproduce the order as it affords singularly clear proof of the contention, always advanced by Nationalists, that under the present system such public liberty as we enjoy, is not an ensured right but an insecure concession, based not on status but on permission, and therefore not, properly speaking, a liberty at all. It runs;—

"Whereas it has been made to appear to me by evidence adduced before me that Pandit Bhoje Dutt, political agitator and Editor of the vernacular paper "Musafir Arya," Agra, has arrived in Calcutta and intends to lecture in the Albert Hall in Calcutta this evening at 8 p. m. on the subject of "Musulman logonke bakhilaf" i. e. against the interests of Mohamedans:—

And whereas I am satisfied that such lecturing or preaching by the said Pandit Bhoje Dutta at any place or in any building in Calcutta may lead to a serious disturbance of the public tranquillity and rioting which will be a source of danger to human life and public safety:—

And whereas I am satisfied that the immediate prevention of such lecturing and preaching by the said Pandit Bhoje Dutt within the town of Calcutta is necessary in the interests of human life and safety and in order to prevent any riot or affray, I do hereby under Section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code order and direct the said Pandit Bhoje Dutt to refrain from delivering any lecture or preaching or holding or taking part in any meeting within the town of Calcutta, and I hereby direct the public generally to refrain from attending or taking part in any lecture or preaching by the said Pandit Bhoje Dutt and to refrain from attending or taking any part in any meeting of meetings held by or on behalf of the said Pandit Bhoje Dutt in the town of Calcutta and I further direct that this order shall remain in force for a period of two months from the date thereof.

Given under my hand and seal of this court dated the 25th September 1909"

The value of the evidence which so easily satisfied Mr. Swinhoe may be judged from its inaccuracy and triviality. Pandit Bhoje Dutt is not a political agitator, but a religious preacher and social reformer; the proposed lecture had nothing to do with the Mahomedans and was upon the Hindu Puranas, and there was no breach of peace or any approach to a breach of the peace at Monghyr. So much for the accuracy. Secondly, Mr. Swinhoe ought to have known that, although a lecture may be against the interests of the Mahomedans, "Against the interests of the Mahomedans" cannot be the title or subject of a lecture, and we can only suppose that this satisfactory witness was a badly-educated detective or informer who either did not know his own meaning or could not make it clear to Mr. Swinhoe. Nor is it alleged that the preaching in Monghyr resulted in a breach of the peace, only that it nearly so resulted. On such incorrect and flimsy evidence, given ex parte and without any opportunity to the lecturer to expose its falsity, a magistrate is able and willing to deprive a citizen of his civic rights for two months and hamper a legitimate movement. If, after proper enquiry, the Magistrate had found that there was likely to be anything inflammatory in the lecture, he could have stopped the speaker from giving that or any similar lecture, but, even so, there would be no ground for a prolonged denial of civic rights. Farther, it is not enough that a lecture should be against the interests of any community, for there may be such a thing as legitimate opposition of interests; the conversion of Hindus to Mahomedanism is against the interest of Hindus and the conversion of Mahomedans to Hinduism is against the interest of Mahomedans, but neither religion can, on that ground, be denied the right of proselytisation. If it be argued that wherever the exercise of legitimate rights may lead to a breach of the peace, that exercise may be stopped, we say that this is a most dangerous principle, since it would be enough for any section of the community to break or threaten to break the peace to stop others from the exercise of their legitimate rights. On such grounds Mr Asquith should be debarred from holding any meeting because the suffragettes climb walls and throw stones wherever he goes! Such a principle simply means putting a premium upon lawlessness. In other countries the indiscreet use of powers by Magistrates is restrained by public opinion but in India there is no such safeguard.

[ Since the above was in type, the Police have undertaken to prove their statements, and the facts stated above must be taken as Pandit Bhoje Dutt's side of the case. Our general criticisms of the policy of the order remain unaffected. The chance now given to the Police to substantiate them case ought to have been given to the Pandit before the order was passed.—EDITOR. ]

INDIAN ART AND AN OLD CLASSIC.

We have before us a new edition of Krittibas's Ramayan, edited and published by that indefatigable literary and patriotic worker, Sj. Ramananda Chatterji. Ramananda Babu is well known to the Bengali public as a clearminded, sober and fearless political speaker and writer; as editor of the Modern Review and the Prabasi he has raised the status and quality of Indian periodical literature to an extraordinary extent, and has recently been doing a yet more valuable and lasting service to his country by introducing the masterpieces of the new school of Art to his readers. His present venture is not in itself an ambitious one, as it purports only to provide a well-printed and beautifully illustrated edition of Krittibas for family reading. With this object the editor has taken the Batatala prints of the Ramayan as his text and reproduced them with the necessary corrections and the omission of a few passages which offend modern ideas of decorum. Besides, the book is liberally illustrated with reproductions of recent pictures by artists of Bombay and Calcutta on subjects chosen from the Ramayan.

The place of Krittibas in our literature is well established. He is one of the most considerable of our old classics and one of the writers who most helped to create the Bengali language as a literary instrument. The sweetness, simplicity, lucidity, melody of the old language is present in every line that Krittibas wrote, but in this recension at least, we miss the racy vigour and nervous vernacular force which was a gift of the early writers. Our impression is that the modern editions do not faithfully reproduce the old classic and that copyists of more learning and puristic taste than critical imagination or poetical sympathy have polished away much that was best in the Bengali Ramayan. The old copies, we believe, reveal a style much more irregular in diction and metre, but more full of humanity, strength and the rough and natural touch of the soil. In no case can our Ramayan compare with the great epic of Tulsidas, that mine of poetry, strong and beautiful thought and description and deep spiritual force and sweetness. But it must have been greater in its original form than in its modern dress.

The great value of the edition lies however in the illustrations. All the pictures are not excellent; indeed we must say quite frankly that some of them are an offence to the artistic perceptions and an affliction to the eye and the soul. Others are masterpieces of the first rank. But in this collection of pictures, most of them now well-known, we have a sort of handy record of the progress of Art in India in recent times. Turning over the pages we are struck first by the numerous reproductions of Ravivarma's pictures which were only recently so prominent in Indian houses and, even now, are painfully common, and we recall with wonder the time when we could gaze upon these crude failures without an immediate revolt of all that was artistic within us. Could anything be more gross, earthy, un-Indian and addressed purely to the eye than his "Descent of Ganges," or more vulgar and unbeautiful than the figure of Aja in the "Death of Indumati", or more soulless and commonplace than the Ahalya, a picture on a level with the ruck of the most ordinary European paintings for the market by obscure hands? Some of these efforts are absolutely laughable in the crudeness of their conception and the inefficiency of their execution; take for instance the fight between Ravan and Jatayu. Raja Rukmangad's Ekadashi is one of the few successes, but spirited as the work undoubtedly is, it is so wholly an imitation of European workmanship that it establishes no claim to real artistic faculty. All that can be said for this painter is that he turned the Indian mind to our own mythology and history for the subject of art, and that he manifests a certain struggling towards outward beauty and charm which is occasionally successful in his women and children. But he had neither the power to develop original conceptions, nor the skill to reproduce finely that which he tried to learn from Europe. He represents in Art that dark period when, in subjection to foreign teaching and ideals, we did everything badly because we did everything slavishly. It is fortunate that the representative of this period was a man without genius: otherwise he might have done infinitely more permanent harm to our taste than he has done.

The art of S. M. V. Durandhar shows a great advance. The basis is European but we see something Indian and characteristic struggling to express itself in this foreign mould. Unlike Ravivarma S. Durandhar has always a worthy and often poetic conception, even when he fails to express it in line and colour. In the stillness and thoughtfulness of the figures in the second illustration of the book there is a hint of the divine presence which is suggested, and Indian richness, massiveness and dignity support this great suggestion. There is augustness and beauty in the picture of Rama and Sita about to enter Guhyaka's boat. Others of his pictures are less successful. Another intermediate worker in the field who is very largely represented, is S. Upendra Kishore Ray. This artist has an essentially imitative genius whose proper field lies in reproduction. There are attempts here to succeed in the European style and others which seek to capture the the secret of the new school, especially where it is original, strange and remote in its greatness; but these are secrets of original genius which do not yield themselves to imitation and the attempt, though it reproduces some of the mannerisms of the school, often ends merely in grotesqueness of line and conception.

We have not left ourselves the space to do justice to the really great art represented in the book, the wonderful suggestions of the landscape in S. Abanindranath Tagore's "Slaying of the Enchanted Deer," the decorative beauty of the "Last Days of Dasarath," and the epic grandeur and grace and strange romantic mystery of "Mahadev receiving the Descent of the Ganges." We would only suggest to the readers whose artistic perceptions are awakened but in need of training, to use the comparative method for which S. Ramananda Chatterji has supplied plentiful materials in this book; for instance, the three illustrations of the Kai-kayi and Manthara incident which are given one after the other.—S. Nandalal Bose's original and suggestive though not entirely successful picture, S. Durandhar's vigorous and character-revealing but too imitatively European work, and S. U. Ray's attempt to master the new style with its striking evidence of a great reproductive faculty but small success where originality is the aim. Finally, let him look at the few examples of old art in the book, then at the work of the new school, especially the two pictures against page 22, and last at Raja Ravivarma's failures. He will realise the strange hiatus in the history of Indian Art brought about by the enslavement of our minds to the West and recognise that the artists of the new school are merely recovering our ancestral heritage with a new development of spiritual depth, power and originality, which is prophetic of the future.

(S.J.) BEPIN CHANDRA PAL. THE SITUATION II.

(Concluded.)

We must realise this simple truth. We must understand that there is such a thing as British Conscience. No organised society is or can be without a conscience. Even the naked cannibals have a conscience of their own. The individual is everywhere impelled to subordinate all individual ends to the ends of his community, not by mere physical force explicit or implicit, but really by the communal conscience, the collective moral sense of the people among he lives and moves and has his being. This communal conscience, this social conscience, this national conscience is the vehicle and organ of Dharma everywhere. And there is no nation or people that has not a conscience of its own. The mistake lies in taking abstract view of this social force. For our conscience is not an independent and isolated faculty,—the sixth sense, that determines right and wrong, in the light of original and universal intuitions, without any reference to our intellectual or emotional, or general social, economic, and political life. This is wrong, an unreal, an abstract view of Conscience. Such a view places our moral faculty and our moral life, beyond the realm of evolution. But our conscience is not such an isolated thing. It is, really the sum total of all our thoughts and experiences. It is the resultant, so to say, of all the social forces working about us. It gives its decisions not merely on considerations of abstract truth or right, but of the complex impulses and motives working within or without us. Individual conscience is thus the expression really of individual character. National conscience is the expression of National character. An appeal to this tells, for it is an appeal to the very soul and being of a people,--an appeal to the concrete and actual, and the ideal, in the life of that nation. The British conscience to which our moderate friends have been appealing so long, is not this real thing. If we want to influence British public opinion, we shall have to find out the real conscience of the people. An appeal to this real conscience, will not give us what we are striving for as ultimate goal, namely self-government or Svaraj. But it will make, if any thing can, the pursuit of our policy and programme of peaceful and lawful self-reliant activities easier and immensely improve the possibilities of peaceful progress towards popular freedom in India.

POLICE SEARCH AGAIN.

"HITABADI" OFFICE RAIDED.

ARREST OF THE PRINTER.

Colootola Street presented a scene of great commotion at about 1 p.m. on Tuesday last when Superintendent Ellis with Inspectors Frizoni, Baidyanath Mukerjee, Pannalal Brahmachari, Sub-Inspector Abdul Ghummi and a posse of constables marched on to the Hitabadi office and entered the premises armed with a body warrant against the Printer and Publisher and another search warrant. The process was in respect of three leading articles appearing in the Hitabadi—"The Indian Budget" on the 8th; (2) "The New Police Act" on the 11th and (3) "Why Do You Come" on the 17th August. These articles, according to the charge in the warrant, were construed to come under the clutches of section 124A. I. P. C.

The search commenced at about 1-10 p.m. Police men were stationed on all sides of the premises and communication with outside was not allowed for sometime. The Printer, Babu Nirad Baran Dass, having presented himself was arrested with due ceremony. A minute search followed and the Police were pleased to seize the following articles:

1. A file of the Hitabadi daily Edition from 22nd June 1908 to 22nd September 1909, including copies dated 8th, 11th and 17th August 1909.

2. A Register of attendance of the Compositors etc.

3. A Register of attendance of the clerks.

4. Copies of the Hitabadi, dated 8th, 11th and 17th August, 1909.

5. One packet containing 127 M. O. Receipts and Coupons and 10 intimation sheets dated 9th August, 1909.

6. One packet containing 76 M. O. Receipts and Coupons and 6 intimation sheets.

7. One packet containing 48 M. O. Receipts and Coupons and three intimation sheets, date 17th August, 1909.

A Register containing the names of subscribers was also amongst the booty. But it was left at the request of the manager, to be produced when required.

The police also pressed for the production of the Mss. Copies and proofs of articles published but they had to leave the idea when the editor told them that these papers are destroyed as soon as they have done with them.

A SUPPLEMENTARY SEARCH.

When the overflowing crowd were struggling to keep in through the windows of the Hitabadi office to ascertain what was being done inside, their attention was diverted to a detachment of Talpoor headed by Inspector Brahmachari who proceeded a little to the south east and forced their unwelcome appearance at 31-1 Colootola Street where Babu Panch Cowrie Banerji lives. A search not less in its vigour was also made there and the valuable treasures which the Police could lay their hands on consisted of three letters of the following descriptions addressed to Panchowri Babu:—

1. Letter of invitation from Phani-bhusan Banerjee to attend the ceremony of the opening of the Swadeshi Steamer Service at Jinkergacha.

2. Letter from Satish Chandra Sastri Manager "Basumati" asking to publish an obituary re the death of his father.

3. Letter from Promothanath Tarkabhusan asking to revise the Mss. copy of the translation of a Pali story.

Having seized documents of such incriminating nature they marched back to the "Hitabadi" Office which they all left at about 4-30 p.m. with the documents and the printer, the big game of their chivalrous expedition.

Both the searches were gone through smoothly and the behaviour of Superintendent Ellis was most courteous. The recipients of this unwelcome visit must thank their lot for these small mercies which were at one time so rare.

THE "HITABADI" SEDITION CASE.

PRINTER RELEASED ON BAIL OF RS. 5,000.

At the Calcutta Police Court on Wednesday before Mr. Swinhoe, Babu Nirode-Baran Dass, Printer and Publisher of the "Hitabadi," a vernacular newspaper was placed for trial on a charge of publishing seditious articles, namely "Bharata Budget—a bluff in Primers" (the Indian Budget) on August 8, last; "Nutan Police Ayin" (the New Police Bill) on August 11, last, and "Keno Ashila" (Why have you come!) on August 17 last, in the above paper. The accused was arrested on Tuesday by Superintendent Ellis of the C. I. D.

Mr. R. C. Sen, Bar-at-law instructed by Babus Monoj Mohon Bose, Kashub Chander Gupta and Sarat Chandra Chatterjee applied for bail.

Mr. Swinhoe ordered the accused to be released on bail of Rs. 5,000, with two sureties of Rs. 2500 each and fixed the day of hearing for the 8th proximo Babu Narendro Nath Sen and Makurlal Dey have stood sureties.

A LECTURE AT THE ALBERT HALL PROHIBITED.

A RULE ISSUED ON THE C. I. D. POLICE.

At the Calcutta Police Court on Tuesday before Mr. Swinhoe, an application was made on behalf of Pandit Bhoji Dutta to have his worship's order, dated the 25th instant, prohibiting him from holding a meeting in the Albert Hall, rescinded.

On Wednesday, Mr. Swinhoe issued a Rule on the C. I. D. police to show cause why the order should not be rescinded.

Mr. Hume, public prosecutor, will appear to show cause.

The date of hearing was fixed for the 8th proximo.

The Tribune in its leading article heartily approves of the proposed Federation Hall in Calcutta but suggest upon the Bengal leaders the desirability of making the Hall a Valhalla of our national worthies instead of confining to Bengal celebrities. But why not make it a natural Valhalla." It also suggests that busts of that great and righteous Viceroy Lord Ripon and steadfast friends like Hume, Wedderburn, Cotton may be placed in the Hall.

The Oriental Telephone Co. issued debentures for £50, 000 to be applied to Bengal Telephone Co. and the Bengal Iron and Steel Co. also issued £50, 000.

NO HELP FROM ZEMINDARS.

The landowners of Bengal as a rule are not an unenterprising class nor is agriculture one of their strong points. Assistance is not to be expected from them and any improvement will have to come from the intelligent and go-a-head classes and not from the Zemindars who have shown themselves singularly indifferent to any improvement of their opportunities in the past and as far as we see will continue to maintain that attitude. It was the Rajah of Naldanga who excited Prof. Wallace's admiration when he saw him shoe his own horses but such Rajahs are rare. The Rajah of Tikari can and does we believe repair his own motor cars having gone through a course in a large Paris motor firm but we do not hear of any one else of the sort. The Bengal Tenancy Act is more in their line and the awful effects of the latest decision of the High Court on suits by co-sharers.—"I. D. News."

HARRYING EX-CONVICTS.

Now and again cases crop up in our Police Courts of old offenders who have already suffered in the aggregate many years of imprisonment again appearing on charges sometimes serious and sometimes slight. And since one of the current theories of penology is that the confirmed offender should be removed from further chances of mischief he is given a long term of imprisonment, sometimes for trifling offences. The terrible injustice that this sometimes entails is seen in a case reported from Sealdah last week. A man, Chuni Lal Khettry by name, sixty years of age and with two previous convictions against him was charged with traveling on the E. B. S. R. for the alleged purpose of committing theft. Under usual circumstances he would have received a further sentence of some severity. But fortunately for him the occupant of the bench that day was Mr. N. L. Bagechi, Deputy Magistrate, who found that Khettry was in possession of a ticket and that there was no scrap or tittle of evidence against him. The Police, as usual with an eye to their percentage of convictions to arrests, asked for a remand to jail for further enquiries, but the Magistrate had some common sense and a little backbone in him. He declined to commit to jail, and, further he indignantly declared that the police had not given the accused a chance to earn an honest livelihood. He had been arrested for no reason. In a further case that day Mr. Bagechi had occasion to criticise the police and he told them roundly he would write especially to the Inspector-General about the matter. Sealdah is to be congratulated upon possessing a Magistrate like Mr. Bagechi and we trust the higher authorities will strongly support him in his efforts to reform the police of that area and to prevent them harrying ex-convicts back to prison before they have hardly been month out of jail. The Prisoners' Aid Society, which has powerful backing from the High Court bench, should also have something to say about the matter. For if precedent goes for anything Mr. Bagechi is about to have a hard fight with his police and any assistance he gets will be welcome.

IRISH EXTREMISTS.—

A new daily paper has made its appearance in Dublin entitled Sinn Féin. It is stated to be the organ of the extreme party, the chief plank in whose platform is the withdrawal of Irish representation from Westminster and the setting up of a National council in Ireland without seeking legislative authority from the British Parliament for purpose. The Times quotes the following from a leading article in the journal:—"We shall seek to find points of agreement and not points of difference. We shall advocate Sinn Féin as the most effective policy but we shall support every honest effort and give full credit to our countrymen of other political parties for all the work they perform for the common good. We shall refuse to regard any Irish party as our enemies. They may be our opponents; they shall not be our enemies. Our enemies are those who govern—and misgovern—this country against the will of its people—not any section of our own countrymen."

AWAKENED PERSIA.

Everything goes to show that Persia has really awakened at last. Even the disinterested anxiety of her friends as to the utter hopelessness of her financial situation has been falsified by recent revelations. It is not true that she is moving heaven and earth for means to pay her soldiers. Rather it appears that those who fought for the Constitution were mostly volunteers, even regular soldiers asking for no remuneration for their services to the country. That the new Government wants money for sundry purposes is plain enough, but it is confident of finding it in the country itself. As the Times correspondent recently admitted, there is no dearth of wealthy men in Persia who are patriotic enough to place their whole fortunes at the disposal of the Nationalists, and the mass of the population were too disgusted with the late regime to grudge any amount of sacrifice to uphold the Constitution. At any rate, there is a growing preponderance of public opinion against the fatal foolishness of a foreign loan. "Opinion is divided even now amongst the leaders of the people," says a correspondent of the Pioneer, "as to the expediency of a foreign loan; the majority are in favour of raising a loan in the country itself... Even at this critical stage the idea of appealing to Russia for money is looked upon with disfavour." The following takes the wind out of the sail of Sir Edward Grey's gallant defence of the Anglo-Russian understanding over Persia:—

The presence of the Russian troops in the country has not by any means improved the situation, and in some quarters the action of Russia is held to be the direct outcome of the policy followed by Great Britain in the south. The position in regard to our relations with Persia is not satisfactory. There is a feeling, rapidly gaining ground, that while in the days before the Anglo-Russian Convention, Great Britain would have prevented aggression on the part of the Russians, now both nations are desirous of depriving Persia of her independence. Entirely wrong as this view is, it is held by some of the leaders of the people. One of them expressed his opinion recently on the Convention as "an ill-fated measure, particularly injurious to British interests." He pointed out that Persia was not bound by the terms of the Convention, having expressly intimated to the British and Russian Legations when the measure was submitted to her that she did not recognise any agreement concluded between the two Powers. He had an opportunity of obtaining the views of the members of the first Mejlis, and found that they were unanimous in the opinion that any compact between Great Britain and Russia in regard to Persia was bound to have evil consequences for the former Power. . . . In the present circumstances, it is doubtful if Great Britain will derive any advantage from her friendship with Russia.

There is already a proposal to place an important business concession in the hands of other financiers than British or Russian! So "Max" will see that the Persians are no longer imbecile hasheesh-eaters who deserve to be trodden upon by a Nadir Shah or a modern edition of that redoubtable tyrant. They have begun to think for themselves and to act for themselves! Yesterday it was the "unspeakable Turk," to-day it is the "despicable Persian," coming into line with the West with one bold bound. What are things coming to? This is more than our modern Horatios can clearly understand.

"NAUTCH GIRLS IN THE LAHORE EXHIBITION."

The Vankteshwar Samachar of Bombay says:—Some one has rightly styled the new assembly of (Congress) Babus as the Mehta Majlis. The practical Laboris are now trying to convert it into a Mahfal. May God grant them success! It will only be then that the proverb of a monkey with a mirror shall attain significance. Our readers are aware that every year an Exhibition is held along with the Congress. The Exhibition is not held simply for amusement sake but the prime object is that people may get instruction by seeing various manufactures and know where they could be had. But it seems that our Lahore friends do not attach much value to this bogey of instruction and knowledge, hence good many of them have thought of converting the Exhibition into a Rang bhawan or a dancing and singing assembly. Our friends argued that there was no use in simply exhibiting clumsy manufacture of the country, that will be only a dull affair; something should be done to divert the mind also. The beauty of Munna Jan, Pyari Jan, Gul Khoro and others was before their eyes. At once they thought of them and resolved to have dancing girls in the Exhibition. That will serve a double purpose. First of all their own eyes and minds will be satiated. Secondly their wives and children will have opportunity of performing veshya mahatam. An expert was sent out to hunt up for various jans. But lo! the terms were being settled with the heroines, when a dry and puritanic fellow like Professor Ruchi Ram intervened and with help of Sir P. C. Chatterjee got the proposal shelved. The shock to our friends can better be imagined than described. They put a heavy slab on their hearts, what could they do? But they need not be pained! May God grant long life to the Mehta Mahfal. Scores of such opportunities will recur and they can then enjoy various jans to their hearts' content. You have now got the Congress Mirror in your hands. Make whatever use of it you like.

"GOOD MORNING BY FORCE"

Mr. E. writes from Dalhousie.—Yesterday (17th) when I was coming from the Post Office, I saw a European on horse-back coming from the opposite side towards me. Reaching me, he stopped and the following conversation took place between us:

European.—Who are you?

Mr. E.—I am an Indian.

E.—Yes, that I know that you are an Indian. Where are you coming from?

B.—I am coming from the Post Office.

E.—How long have you been here?

B.—Since Saturday last.

E.—Are you a new comer?

B.—Yes, Sir.

E.—Why have you come here?

B.—Simply to see Dalhousie.

E.—Do you know who am I?

B.—No.

E.—I am an Officer.

B.—Thank you, Sir.

E.—Then bid me Good-morning.

B.—Good-morning, Sir.

The European pleased at this, spurred his horse and I, also, laughing at this strange "Good Morning" by force, went home.

RELATIONS BETWEEN INDIA AND ENGLAND.

A HINDU LEADER'S VIEWS.

How high is the ideal of British connection among a section of thoughtful and cultured Hindus will be evident from the following essential portions of a letter addressed by Babu Sarada Charan Mitra to a leading politician in England.

"... I am fully sensible that India is not fit to obtain Local Self-Government in the same way as Canada and other Colonies. There are great difficulties in its being made a self-governing colony, although the Colonial form of Government is a legitimate aspiration of the Indian people. But what I intended to say in my letter to you is that England should not be apathetic towards India, that India should be dealt with by the British as a part of Great Britain and that the tie between the two countries should be closer than that between England and her self-governing colonies. India should, as I have said, be "a part and parcel of England," notwithstanding its physical separation. India should have representatives in the House of Commons in the same way as French India has representative in the National Assembly.

It is a hopeful sign that Britain's sympathy for India is gradually increasing. In proportion as the government of the colonies will be separated from the Home government Britain will draw India into its bosom and I expect the time will come when she will cease to consider India to be a mere dependency but will consider it a part of it. It is a distant hope but sooner such a day comes the better it will be for both countries.

It may be said that the great majority of the Liberal Party are practically representatives of India although they are selected by British constituencies. The number of such representatives will gradually increase and at last the British Parliament will deem it expedient to call upon India to select its own representatives. My ideas and words have you will suppose, a prophetic tone but wish as often said is the father of thought.

Many of my European friends think that a Colonial form of Government like that of Australia or even Canada means virtual independence. That is undoubtedly so and unless European population predominates in India there is no hope or even possibility of such a self-government for India but it is feasible to have Indian representatives in the governing body in London."

Yours Sincerely.

(Sd) SARADA CHARAN MITRA.

ENGLAND'S PROBLEM IN INDIA.

AN ITALIAN VIEW.

In the course of a recent article on Indian Affairs, inspired by the execution of Madan Lal Dhingra, the "Secole," of Milan, writes:—

What do the Hindus want? They only wish to be masters in their own house. In the subordinate line, as the lawyers say, they wish to have autonomy or self-government like the Canadians, the Australians, and the Africans of Austral Africa. The English say that they are not mature, and limit themselves to petty reforms which they think ought to satisfy the restless Nationalists. But it is now quite clear that these petty reforms will not suffice. The whole country is agitated by a spirit of revolt. What will England do to keep in check three hundred millions of rebels, with the hundred and fifty thousand armed men which she maintains in India? That is the great problem which is beginning to disturb the minds of such English as think at all. "We have conquered India with the sword, and we mean to preserve it with the sword" is what an English general has said.

It is a profound error, which could be rooted only in the brain of a military man by profession. Half a century ago it was still perhaps possible to over-rule a nation with the sword alone. Now it is not so, particularly in the case of Asiatic populations still thrilling at the recollection of the Japanese victories at Mukden and Tsushima. If England, mistress of the art of colonisation, wishes to preserve India she will continue to adapt herself, as in the case of Canada, Australia, and even Egypt; abandoning from time to time a part of her authority and making all the concessions that the Indians demand in their meetings. On this condition alone will England succeed in prolonging her domination over India, until the day arrives on which the quondam colony, like all the other colonies for that matter, will detach itself from the tree like a ripe pear.

THE TRANSVAAL STRUGGLE

Like the siege of Gibraltar the attack upon the Transvaal Citadel of Indian national honour and manhood has been carried on during three long and weary years. It has been signalised by much of treachery and foul play on the part of the besiegers and redeemed by much of heroism mostly unconscious, on that of the besieged. On the one hand, may be set broken pledges, shameful allegations, abuse of confidence, slander of a confidence, slander of a whole community, shocking ill-treatment, cruel injustice; on the other, wonderful courage and endurance, boldness and fortitude, self-sacrifice and self-restraint, determination and persistency, devotion and patriotism, self-respect and self-development.

Whilst the Transvaal Government have had all the power of the State at their commands a whilst they have been able to supply secretly false information and doctored facts to the Imperial Government without the unhappy Indians having an opportunity for reply until months afterwards when the poison had already done its work; whilst they have been able to use all the terrorism that are associated in the public mind with indiscriminate Police intrusion, wholesale arrests, ill-treatment and semi-starvation in goal, hostile magistrates arbitrary deportation, the ruin consequent upon forced sales of goods, undue pressure brought to bear by European wholesale merchants, and a dozen other manifestations of an compromising authority; the unfortunate victims of this policy of suppression and annihilation of a whole community have only one weapon of defence—a willingness to suffer every hardship, even death itself, for the sake of conscience, and because they believed that right was on their side. It is not going too far to state that the welfare of the entire Indian community in the Transvaal is in the hands of less than half-a-dozen men acting arbitrarily. Let us take a concrete instance. A pre-war Indian resident of the Transvaal returns to the Colony in 1901, let us say, after leaving it in 1902 or the early part of 1903. He is ignorant of the arrangement whereby the community agreed with Lord Milner to re-register voluntarily. On the strength of his old Dutch Registration Certificate he has returned to the Transvaal before the Government's decision that such a document would not act as a Permit. He is therefore entered in a perfectly bona fide manner. He applied for registration during the voluntary period last year, but was refused, no explanation being given. The real reason of the refusal is that he cannot produce a Milner Registration Certificate and Permit, and the fact of his possession of a Dutch Pass renders him a suspect to the authorities. Suppose now that, under Act 16 of 1902, he had been registered under Act 16 of 1902, marked "re-registered in the hands of the Registrar." He would then be further evience of pre-war residence. He is at once assumed to be an unlawful entrant his application is refused, and a warrant is issued for his arrest. It is true that he has a right of appeal against the Registrar's decision but this he probably does not know, and he may not be able to afford to pay counsel to conduct the appeal. He is arrested, formally brought before the Magistrate and ordered to be deported from the Colony. There is no appeal from the Magistrate's order, which is administrative and not judicial and the fate of this man, a lawful resident is thus in the hands of the Registrar a Police Superintendent and a Magistrate each acting arbitrarily. He may be snatched away from his family who are thus left in all probability, quite unprovided for and sent away to India without the possibility of making any effective protest. Cases have been known where men born in the Transvaal have been put over the border of that Colony, and there has recently arrived in India a man who was born in Natal and domiciled in the Orange River Colony, who was deported in this way. The Transvaal Government have acted in a lawless manner again and again, safe in the knowledge that most of their victims are unable to seek redress. Again and again the Supreme Court has condemned their action and now they secure themselves even against this by arranging with the Portuguese authorities of the Province of Mozambique to detain deported Indians and send them to India instead of giving them the opportunity to return receive sentence as prohibited immigrants and appeal to the Supreme Court against the sentence with the object of defending their claims.

Throughout all this trouble the Transvaal Indians have exercised a patience and a forbearance that have extorted the unwilling admiration even of those who have been most hostile to their demands. Men and boys have gone to goal repeatedly for the sake of the cause. Their country's honour was at stake, there was the solemn oath that they had taken to die in goal rather than shamefully surrender and they felt that the whole future of the community was in their hands. The women cheerfully sent their husbands, brothers and sons to starvation and degradation in prison rather than that they should suffer deeper degradation of betrayal of their brethren.

There have been over 2,500 convictions; there have been ruined businesses; there has been mental and physical torture; there have been deaths. Hearts have been broken, families have been surrendered, homes have been destroyed, happiness has vanished. The small remnant who are still continuing the struggle mostly Madrasias, have sworn to die in goal, unless the Transvaal Government concede the just demands of the community.

And now the Transvaal Indians appeal to India to help. They appointed four delegates to place the position before the Indian Public and authorities three of these were arrested and imprisoned so that the departure of the Deputation might be prevented. Thus the Transvaal Government have tried to bind and gag the Indians in the Transvaal. The latter in their extremity, turn to India to offer so powerful an expression of opinion, that the moral support that she can give will enable the Imperial Government effectively to intervene to procure a satisfactory settlement. Mr. H. S. L. Polak in the Indian Review.

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilised languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether in the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world: they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties, religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANI Parvam of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvams.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS—THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be written in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis is his great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstract Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such a lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. Reduced Rs. 1-8. Postage Extra.

নারী-ধর্ম্য।

‘গরিজা স্তম্বর চক্রবর্তী’ প্রণীত।

এতদ্ব্যতীত নরনারীর অবশ্যপাঠ্য উপাদেয় পুস্তিকা। সংবাদ পত্রসমূহে বিশেষ প্রশংসিত। মূল্য ৮০ টাইটাকা। ডি: পি: বায় ও মাস্তুল সত্তর। ১৪ নং শ্রামবাজার ষ্ট্রীট, কলিকাতা এজেন্সিতে প্রাপ্য।

নারক বলেন—এই ক্ষুদ্র পুস্তকে গ্রহ-কার বিশেষ কৃতিত্ব দেখাইয়াছেন। হিন্দু-গৃহে নারীর কি ভাবে জীবন যাপন করা উচিত, এই প্রবন্ধ নিচের তাহার একটি পাতা দেখুট চিত্র দেওয়া হইয়াছে।

বহুমতী বলেন—“পুণ্য আদেশ” লেখক মদনভট্টের এসঙ্গে বলিয়াছেন “প্রেমের নিকট বিশ্ববিমোহন রূপ, ত্রিলোকবিজয় মদন ও বসন্তাদি উদ্ভীপন কারণকে আজ পরাজয় স্বীকার করিতে হইল। আজ কেন? উহারা চির দিনই প্রেমের নিকট পরাজিত। আসঙ্গলিপির নিকটই উহাদের যত শক্তি প্রকাশের প্রযোগ। আসঙ্গলিপির রূপমোহে মুগ্ধ; চন্দ্র চন্দন ও বসন্তাদি উদ্ভাদক কারণে পাগল। হিন্দু আসঙ্গলিপিকে ঘৃণা করে। হিন্দুর প্রেমের আদর্শ পার্বতী-পরমেশ্বর।” ***জন্ম ও শকুন্তলার মধ্যে দেবতা ও সেবিকার বৃদ্ধি জন্মিবার অবসর হয় নাই। ইঞ্জিয়-যত্নিত মিলন ঘটাইয়াছিল। একরূপ মিলনে দেবতার অভিলাষ আছে। একরূপ মিলন কখন শিবদ হয় না। তাই কবি দুর্জয়সার শাপে এ মিলনে বিচ্ছেদ ঘটাইলেন। রোগের কারণ বর্তমান সময়ের “দ্রৌণিকা”, “গৃহলক্ষী” প্রভৃতি প্রবন্ধেও হিন্দু নারী-ধর্ম্যের প্রকৃতরূপ বর্ণিত হইয়াছে; আর সঙ্গ সঙ্গ বর্তমান পরিবর্তিত সামাজিক অবস্থার আমাদের কর্তব্যেরও বিচার করা ইয়াছে। প্রবন্ধগুলি সুনির্ভিত ও আশ্রয়নযোগ্য।

BRAHMACHYVA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

BY

DR. B. S. CHANDRA CHARRAVATTY.

The Brahmacarya (conducted by Col. H. S. O'Connor, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his duty."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Hindus of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would secure their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Calcutta, Calcutta):—"Brahmacharya describes the life which Brahman ought to live. It contains the path of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, mental and spiritual culture of students. The changes which the altered conditions of present day life require are carefully noted. The book is in a structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as to be of use to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR N. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. L. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their present state. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

The Apostasy of the National Council.

We have received an open letter from some teachers of the Rungpur National school in which they warn the President of the National Council of Education of the evil effects likely to ensue from the recent National Risley Circular and protest strongly against the policy underlying it. For reasons of space we are unable to publish the letter. The signatories point out that the movement took its birth in the boycott movement and was from the first, closely associated with it in nature and sympathy, that the participation of young men in the national awakening has been one of the chief causes of its rapid progress and success and that the new policy of the Council not only divorces education from the life of the country, but destroys the sympathy and support of the most progressive elements in the nation. It is also pointed out that the donation made by Raja Subodh Mallik, from which the practicability of the movement took its beginning, and the sacrifices made by the teachers and students of the first established schools were intimately connected with the revolt against the Risley Circular, and yet the same circular is repeated in a more stringent form by the Council itself. There were two conditions attached to Raja Subodh Chandra's gift; the first that the maintenance of the Rangpur and Dacca schools, which were created to give shelter to students who persisted in taking part in politics in spite of all prohibitions, should be assisted out of his donation, and second that no form of Government control should be submitted to by the Council. It would be mere hypocrisy to deny that the issue of the prohibitory telegrams by the Secretary was the result of the Government circular previous to the seventh of August. We do not know by what morality or law of honour the Council clings to the donation while infringing in the spirit its most vital condition. Perhaps these things also, no less than courage and sincerity, are considered unessential in this new "national" education. We notice that Sj Hirendranath Dutt at Dacca seems to have openly proclaimed the abjuration of all connection with politics as part of the duty of a "National" school. We must therefore take the divorce of the National Council from the national movement as part of a deliberate and permanent policy, and not, as it might otherwise have been imagined, a temporary aberration due largely to the fact that the President and the most active of the two Secretaries are members of Legislative Councils and therefore parts of the Government which is supposed to have no control over the institution. All that we can now expect of the Council is to be a centre of scientific and technical education; it can no longer be a workshop in which national spirit and energy are to be forged and shaped.

The Progress of China.

A recent article in the Aurita Bazaar Patrika gives a picture of the enormous educational progress made by China in a few years. In the short time since the Boxer troubles China has revolutionized her educational system, established a network of modern schools of all ranks, provided for a thorough modern education for her princes and nobles, and added to the intellectual education a thorough grounding in military knowledge and the habits of the soldier, so that, when the process is complete, the whole Chinese people will be a nation trained in arms whom the greatest combination of powers will not care to touch. On another side of national development, a railway has just been opened which has been entirely constructed and will be run by Chinese. When the process of education is well forward, it is intended by the Chinese Government to transform itself into a constitutional and Parliamentary government, and in its programme this great automatic revolution has been fixed to come off in another eight years. No other race but the Chinese, trained by the Confucian system to habits of minute method, perfect organisation and steady seriousness in all things great and small, could thus calmly map out a stupendous political, social and educational change as if it were the programme of a ceremonial function, and carry it out with thoroughness and efficiency. Once the Chinese have made up their minds to this revolution, they are likely to carry it out with the greatest possible completeness, businesslike method, effective organisation, and the least possible waste and friction. In the history of China, no less than the history of Japan, we are likely to see the enormous value of national will-power using the moral outcome of a great and ancient discipline, even while breaking the temporary mould in which that discipline had cast society, thought and government. We in India have an ancient discipline much more powerful than the Chinese or Japanese; but where is the centre of sovereignty in India which will direct the national will-power to the right use of that discipline? Where even is the centre of national endeavour which will make up for the absence of such a Government? We have a Government manned by aliens, out of touch with and contemptuous of the sources of national strength and culture; we have an education empty of them which seeks to replace our ancient discipline by a foreign strength, instead of recovering and invigorating our own culture and turning it to modern uses; we have leaders trained in the foreign discipline who do not know or believe in the force that would, if made use of, revolutionise India more swiftly and mightily than Japan was or China is being revolutionised. It is this and not internal division or the drag of old and unsuitable conditions that makes the work in India more difficult than in any other Asiatic country.

Partition Day.

Partition Day comes round again on the 16th October. Last year, executive caprice prevented the day from being celebrated with all its accustomed ceremonies; this year, there is not likely to be a similar interference, and we trust that all the usual circumstances of the occasion will be observed without any abridgment. On the 7th of August the official organisers were afraid to start the procession from the College Square; now that S. J. Surendranath is with us, we trust that no such unworthy considerations will be allowed to mar the fullness and imposing nature of this feature. From no other centre in Calcutta is an effective procession at all probable, and it was seen last August that the only result of trying to change it was to break up the procession and mar its effect. The two most essential features, however, of the Partition Day are the Rakhi Bandhan and the reading of the National Proclamation; it is above all a day of the declaration of Bengal's indivisible unity and these two functions are for that reason the very kernel of the observances. It is unfortunate that the celebration should coincide this year with the Puja sales, as this may interfere with the closing of the shops, which is the most salient sign of protest against the dismemberment. We hope the official organisers are taking steps to counteract this unfavourable factor.

NATIONALIST WORK IN ENGLAND.

We publish in this issue an article by S. J. Bepin Chandra Pal in which he suggests the necessity of a Nationalist agency or bureau in England, and states the reasoning which has led him to modify the views formerly held by the whole party on the inutility of work in England under the present political conditions. Bepin Babu has been busy, ever since his departure from India, in work of this kind and it goes without saying that he would not have engaged in it or persisted in it under discouraging circumstances, if it had not been borne in on him that it was advisable and necessary. At the same time, rightly or wrongly, the majority of our party still believe in the concentration of work into the effort to elicit and organise the latent strength of the nation, and cannot believe that work in England at present is anything but hopeless and a waste of money and energy. We freely admit that under certain circumstances an agency in England might become indispensable. That would certainly be the case if an elective body with substantial but limited powers were established in India and serious differences of opinion were to arise between the Government and the popular representatives. But such a state of things is yet remote, and the reformed councils will certainly not be such a body. At present, what will such a bureau or agency do for the country? Bepin Babu suggests that it may supply the British public with correct information so as to stem the tide of unscrupulous or prejudiced mis-information pouring into England through Reuter and other Anglo-Indian sources, and that, if the British public get correct information, they will at once put a stop to the policy of repression. We confess, our impression is the reverse,—that however correct the information we supply, the British public as a whole—we do not speak of just and open-minded individuals,—will still prefer to put confidence in the mis-statements of their own countrymen rather than in the true statements of what they believe to be an inferior race indebted to them for any element of civilisation it may now possess. Our impression is that even a correct idea of the facts would not necessarily lead to a correct appreciation and policy based on those facts;—many political and psychological factors would interfere.

If we are to change our opinion, it must be either as the result of new experience showing the effect of agitation in England or of new reasoning correcting the imperfections of our old premises and conclusions. The only fact that seems to be in favour of a re-adjustment of our views, is the energetic campaign in Parliament of Mr Mackarness and his friends for the release of the deportees. It is alleged that, but for the untoward incident of the Curzon Wyllie murder, some if not all the deportees would by this time have been released. We have our doubts about this conclusion. Sir Henry Cotton and some of his colleagues were always ever-hopeful about the effect of their pressure, and their expectations were more than once disappointed. No ministerial pronouncement ever lent any colour to their idea that the release was imminent when the assassination happened. All that the Government had promised, was to consider the question of the deportees, farther detention, in the usual course, on the presentation of the sixmonthly report, a consideration usual without any Parliamentary agitation. The discomfort of the questions was, no doubt, great and the long-established sentiment of many Liberals and not a few Conservatives was offended by the long detention of public men without a trial. But this in itself, though it strewn the path of the deporters with thorns instead of its being, as they would have liked, strewn with roses, would not, by itself, have secured the release of the deportees. Even if it had, the release of one or two or more of the deportees would not have removed the policy of repression. Only the repeal of the Act could have done that, and it must have been followed by the eradication of executive illegalities and police harrassment as well as of the readiness of Government to pass repressive legislation, before the real obstacles in the way of peaceful progress could be removed. Would an agency in England seriously help towards such a consummation,—that is the question. It means the diversion of money and effort, and we must see a reasonable chance of a return before we embark on it.

Bepin Babu urges that it will, and bases his conception on a certain reading of the British character and policy which we hesitate to endorse in its entirety. It is quite true that we have heard of certain irresponsible Englishmen longing for a violent outbreak on the part of the people, which would give them an excuse for equally violent measures to crush Indian aspirations for ever. But we do not believe for a moment, that some of the responsible officials, —and that we believe is all Bepin Babu implies,—cherished the same idea. We think that all Government officials have regarded the outbreak of Terrorism, small though it was, with alarm and the utmost anxiety to get rid of it, and indeed we believe the institution of organised repression to have been the result of an ignorant and unreasoning alarm which hugely exaggerated the dimensions and meaning of the outbreak, as well as wholly misunderstood the drift of the Nationalist movement. We take exception also to Bepin Babu's suggestion of the bully in the British character being responsible for the repressions, as if it were something peculiar to the British race. What Bepin Babu wishes to indicate by this phrase, the readiness to use repression and what are erroneously called strong measures, to intimidate a popular movement, is a tendency which belongs not to British character especially but to human nature, and should be considered the result not of character but of the position. The Government in India favour repression because it seems the only way of getting over what they regard as a dangerous movement, without concessions which mean the immediate or gradual cessation of their absolute paramountcy. It is a case of incompatible interests, and until both parties can be brought to a modus vivendi, such it will remain. How is that incompatibility to be surmounted, for, at first sight, it seems to be an insurmountable obstacle. Bepin Babu relies on the enlightened self-interest of the British people and to a certain extent on their civilized conscience. We think we may as well leave the civilized conscience out of the reckoning for the present. The civilized conscience is a remarkably queer and capricious quantity, on which, frankly, we place no reliance whatever. It is very sensitive to breaches of principle by others and very indignant when the same breaches of principle are questioned in its own conduct. It sees the mote in other eyes; it is obstinately unaware of the beam in its own. It is always criticising other nations, but it ignores or is furious at criticism of its own. It has fits of sensitiveness in which it makes large resolutions, but it can never be trusted to persist in them contrary to its own interests. This civilized conscience is not peculiar to the British people, but belongs in a greater or less degree to every European nation with the possible exception of Russia. We prefer infinitely to rely, if we have to rely on anything, on the sense of enlightened self-interest. Here also we differ from Bepin Babu. He argues as if the British were a thoughtful and clearminded people, and only needed the data to be correctly placed before them in order to understand their interests correctly. This is far from the truth about British character. The English are, or were, a people with a rough practical common sense and business-like regularity and efficiency which, coupled with a mighty thw and sinew and a bulldog tenacity and courage, have carried them through all dangers and difficulties and made them one of the first peoples of the globe. They have had men of unsurpassed thought-power and clearness of view and purpose, but the race is not thoughtful and clearminded; on the contrary on all questions requiring thought, intelligence and sympathy they are amazingly muddle-headed and can only learn by knocking their shins against hard and rough facts. When this first happens, they swear profusely, rub their shins and try to kick the obstacle out of the way. If it consents to be kicked out of the path, they go on their way rejoicing; otherwise, after hurting their shins repeatedly they begin to respect the obstacle stop, swearing and kicking, and negotiate with it. In this process, familiar to all who have to do with Englishmen from the point of view of conflicting interests, there is much rough practical sense but little thought and intelligence. It is on this conception of the British character that the Nationalist party has hitherto proceeded. The hard fact of a continued and increasing Boycott, an indomitable national movement, a steady passive resistance, have been the obstacles they have sought to present to the British desire for an absolute lordship. We must prevent these obstacles from being kicked out of the way by repression, but the way to achieve that end is to show a tenacity and courage and a power of efficiency rivalling the British, and not to make an appeal to the conscience and clear common sense of the British public. We could only imagine such an appeal having an effect in the as yet improbable circumstance of a Liberal Government with a small majority dependent for its existence on a powerful Socialist and Independent Labour party. Even of this should be the result of the approaching general elections, the appeal could not have effect unless the hard facts were there in strong evidence in India itself. Our whole effort should be devoted to establishing these hard facts in a much more efficient and thorough way than we have hitherto done, and the only way is for the Nationalist party to establish its separate existence, clear from the drag of Moderatism on the one side and disturbance by ill-instructed outbreaks of Terrorism on the other, and erect itself into a living, compact and working force in India.

One day the Government in India will be obliged to come to the Nationalist party, which it is now trying to destroy, for help in bringing about a satisfactory settlement of the quarrel between the bureaucracy and the people. But that will not be till they have exhausted their hopes of achieving the same end on their own terms by playing on the weaknesses of the Moderate party. If the country were to follow the Moderate lead and content itself with the paltry and undesirable measure of reform now proposed, the progress of India towards self-government would be indefinitely postponed. The Nationalist party therefore, while showing all willingness to coalesce with the Moderates in the Congress on reasonable terms, must jealously guard their separate individuality and existence and decline to enter the Congress on terms which would make them an inoperative force and perpetuate the misbegotten creature of the Allahabad Convention Committee under the name of the Congress. Nor should they be drawn into experiments in England which are, at present, of doubtful value or none.

THE BRAIN OF INDIA.

I

We have spoken in a previous issue of the pre-occupation of the Indian mind with political and economic issues and the reasons why this had to be; we recognised at the time that the hour had come for a widening of the horizon. Such a widening is especially necessary for Bengal. The Bengali leads because he has eminently the gifts which are most needed for the new race that has to arise. He has the emotion and imagination which is open to the great inspirations, the mighty heart-stirring ideas that move humanity when a great step forward has to be taken. He has the invaluable gift of thinking with the heart. He has, too, a subtle brain which is able within certain limits to catch shades of meaning and delicacies of thought, both those the logic grasps and those which escape the mere logical intellect. Above all, he has in a greater degree than other races the yet undeveloped supermind or faculty of direct knowledge, latent in humanity and now to be evolved, which is above reason and imagination, the faculty which in Sri Ramakrishna, the supreme outcome of the race, dispensed with education and commanded any knowledge he desired easily and divinely. This faculty which now works irregularly in humanity, unrecognised and confused by the interference of reason and imagination, of the limited reason and of the old associations or sankaras stored in the memory of the race and the individual. It can not be made a recognized and habitual agent except by the discipline which the ancient Indian sages formulated in the science of Yoga. But certain races have the function more evolved or more ready for evolution than the generality of mankind, and it is these that will lead in the future evolution. In addition, the race has a mighty will-power which comes from the long worship of Shakti and practice of the Tantra that has been a part of our culture for many centuries. No other people could have revolutionised its whole national character in a few years as Bengal has done. The Bengali has always worshipped the divine Energy in her most terrible as well as in her more beautiful aspects; whether as the Beautiful or the Terrible Mother he has never shrunk from her whether in fear or in awe. When the divine force flowed into him he has never feared to yield himself up to it and follow the infinite prompting, careless whither it led. As a reward he has become the most perfect adhara of Shakti, the most capable and swiftly sensitive and responsive receptacle of the infinite Will and Energy the world now holds. Recently that Will and Energy has rushed into him and has been lifting him to the level of his future mission and destiny. He has now to learn the secret of drawing the Mother of Strength into himself and holding her there in a secure possession. That is why we have pointed to a religious and spiritual awakening as the next necessity and the next inevitable development.

But along with his great possessions the Bengali has serious deficiencies. In common with the rest of India he has a great deficiency of knowledge, the result of an education meagre in quantity and absolutely vicious in method and quality. And he is inferior to other Indian races, such as the Madrasi and Maratha, in the capacity of calm, measured and comprehensive deliberation which is usually called intellect or reasoning power, and which, though it is far from the whole of thought, is essential to the completeness of thought. By itself the logical faculty creates the cold and careful scholar, the logician, the rationalist and the politician, the conservative, but it lacks that great mass of human knowledge which makes for slow but sure progress. It does not create the hero and the originator, the inspired prophet, the mighty builder, the maker of nations; it does not conquer nature and destiny, lay its hand on the future, command the world. The rest of India is largely dominated by this faculty and limited by it, therefore it lags behind while Bengal rushes forward. The rest of India has feared to deliver itself to the Power that came down from above to uplift the nation; it has either denied its call or made reservations and insisted on guiding it and reigning it in. A few mighty men have stridden forward and carried their race or a part of it with them, but the whole race must be infused with the spirit before it can be fit for the work of the future.

On his side the Bengali, while in no way limiting the divine inrush or shortening the Titan stride, must learn to see the way he is going while he treads it. For want of a trained thought-power, he follows indeed the ideas that seize him, but he does not make them thoroughly his own. He thinks them out, if at all, rapidly but not comprehensively, and, in consequence though he has applied them with great energy to the circumstances immediately around him, a new set of circumstance finds him perplexed and waiting for a lead from the few men to whom he has been accustomed to look for the source of his thought and action. This is a source of weakness. For the work of the present and still more, for the work of the future, it is imperatively necessary to create a centre of thought and knowledge which will revolutionise the brain of the nation to as great an extent as its character and outlook has been revolutionized. A new heart was necessary for our civilisation, and, though the renovation is not complete, the work that has been done in that direction will ensure its own fulfilment. A new brain is also needed, and sufficiency of knowledge for the new brain to do its work with thoroughness.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER. VI.

It was far on in the night and the moon rode high overhead. It was not the full moon and its brilliance was not so keen. An uncertain light, confused with shadowy hints of darkness, lay over an open common of immense extent, the two extremities of which could not be seen in that pale lustre. This plain affected the mind like something illimitable and desert, a very abode of fear. Through it there ran the road between Murshidabad and Calcutta.

On the road-side was a small hill which bore upon it a goodly number of mango-trees. The tree-tops glimmered and trembled with a sibilant rustle in the moonlight, and their shadows too, black upon the blackness of the rocks, shook and quivered. The ascetic climbed to the top of the hill and there in rigid silence listened, but for what he listened, it is not easy to say; for, in that great plain that seemed as vast as infinity, there was not a sound except the murmurous rustle of the trees. At one spot there is a great jungle near the foot of the hill,—the hill above the high road below, the jungle, between. I do not know what sound met his ear from the jungle, but it was in that direction the ascetic went. Entering into the denseness of the growth he saw in the forest, under the darkness of the branches at the foot of long rows of trees, men sitting,—men tall of stature, black of hue, armed; their burnished weapons glittered fierily in the moonlight where it fell through gaps in the woodland leafage. Two hundred such armed men were sitting there, not one uttering a single word. The ascetic went slowly into their midst and made some signal, but not a man rose, none spoke, none made a sound. He passed in front of all, looking at each as he went, scanning every face in the gloom, as if he were seeking someone he could not find. In his search he recognised one, touched him and made a sign, at which the other instantly rose. The ascetic took him to a distance and they stood and talked apart. The man was young; his handsome face wore a thick black moustache and beard; his frame was full of strength; his whole presence beautiful and attractive. He wore an ochre-coloured robe and on all his limbs the fairness and sweetness of sandal was smeared. The Bruhacharin said to him, "Bhavananda, have you any news of Mohendra Singha?"

At this point the ascetic interrupted him, "I know what happened at the inn. Who did it?"

"Village rustics, I imagine. Just now the peasants of all the villages have turned dacoits from compulsion of hunger. And who is not a dacoit nowadays? To day we also have looted and eaten. Two maunds of rice belonging to the Chief of Police were on its way; we took and consecrated it to a devotee's dinner."

The ascetic laughed and said, "I have rescued his wife and child from the thieves. I have just left them in the monastery. Now it is your charge to find out Mohendra and deliver his wife and daughter into his keeping. Jivananda's presence here will be sufficient for the success of today's business."

Bhavananda undertook the mission and the ascetic departed elsewhere.

NATIONALIST WORK IN ENGLAND.

Two things must be clearly understood in connection with our British work. In the first place, we do not believe that we shall attain real self-government either of the colonial or of any other pattern, as a free and kindly gift from the British people. Such an act of generosity would involve too great a sacrifice to be reasonably expected of any nation. Least of all can it be expected of a nation that has never had any large dose of emotionalism or idealism in the composition of its life and character. In the next place, it should be recognised that as the British cannot give us what we are striving for, as our ultimate end and goal, neither can they adopt, in the twentieth century, with all the fierce light of a jealous world-opinion constantly beating about their administration, any fiercely barbarous measures for putting down our legitimate and peaceful activities. Every act of serious repression will have to be justified, some way or other, not only before civilised world-opinion, but even before a large and increasing section of the British public. Up to a certain point, British public opinion itself will resist excessive official repression in India. We have had instances of this even during the last two or three years. The release of Lala Lajpat Rai is a clear illustration of it. The Indian Government, left to themselves, would hardly have let the Lala out so soon. It was the Parliamentary agitation on the subject which really led to his release. And the release of the present deportees, when it comes about, will be largely due to the increasing discontent in the rank and file of the British Liberals with these "un-British" methods, as they call them, of Lord Morley. We were indeed looking forward to their release last July, and if the murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie had not found the Government a fresh show of excuse by this time, some, if not all of the present deportees would have surely been out of prison by now. Recent events in Bengal also, seem to strengthen this contention. It is the fear of rousing a protest here, and more particularly in the House of Commons, that has evidently deterred the Government from following the advice of the Anglo Indian merchants and traders for putting down the boycott demonstrations in Bengal. They stopped these in Bombay; because Bombay affairs have of late received but scant attention here. These are facts that cannot be gainsaid; and in view of these, it is scarcely reasonable to set absolutely no value upon British public opinion, as a controlling force in Indian politics. And if it be a controlling force, can the Nationalist, striving for a peaceful settlement of the complex issues that confront his country at this juncture, refuse to take every possible step, to influence this controlling force in British politics? The success of our propaganda of peaceful passive resistance, depends almost entirely, at the present moment, upon our ability, to reduce, if we cannot remove, the rigors of official repression. Increase or continuance of this repression will kill people's faith in these moral forces upon which our movement stands. It will inevitably drive the movement beyond the moral plane. And a physical struggle between the Government and the people in India will spell utter ruin and disaster to our cause. The enemies of this cause are only too eager to rush it to a physical revolt or revolution. It would be easier then to crush it altogether. Even a section of our own people are playing into their hands, by giving them some show of justification, to exhaust by excessive repressions the patience of the people. This is their game. We have to do all in our power to spoil this game. The hand of repression must be stayed for this purpose; and it can only be done by influencing British public opinion. And British public opinion will not be influenced by appeals to its generosity or liberalism, however flattering these may be. It will not be moved to any practical efforts by our hollow protestations of loyalty to the British Empire either. It will be effectively moved only by considerations of its own interests. Far greater attention is paid to Indian affairs here now than had ever before been the case. True it is that the papers are, almost without a single exception, practically supporting the present repressive policy. But it is because the majority of them believe that it will soon settle the Indian Unrest and the few that do not, are unwilling to take up any strong attitude against a policy that has the sanction of Lord Morley, the one man in the Liberal party whose moral influence over his party men is absolutely supreme and almost unbounded. There are however, here and there, signs of a feeble awakening. A few publicists have commenced to realise not only the futility but even the dangers of this repressive policy. It is our distinct duty to feed and strengthen this feeble current. If we can convince the British public that the present policy of their Indian Government is creating the conditions of a prolonged and violent revolutionary struggle in India, a struggle which, whatever its ultimate fate, will, long before that fate is decided, practically ruin every British enterprise in that country, and inflict such a tremendous economic loss on the nation as no political victory will be able to make good, they will at once rise up in arms against this policy, and bring about an immediate reversal of it.

At present they do not realise these dangers. The Government one day proclaims the urgency of stringent measures to meet the unrest and the next day, as soon as they are passed, send out strongly worded assurances that the evil has been well brought in hand. This double game is significant. They have to admit the seriousness of the situation to justify repression. But this very thing which justifies repression, drives capital away, and causes nervous depression in capitalist centres, threatening the collapse of many enterprises in India. Consequently to re-assure the capitalist class, they have, almost in the same breath, to declare that the country is quiet. The repressions and the reforms have, practically, succeeded in removing all cause of anxiety. Thus the game of bluff goes on from day to day.

This game must be checked. The British public must be supplied with informations regarding the actual state of things in India. They have, hitherto, been treated to pleasant stories concerning their achievements in that country. These have fed their pride of race. These have created in their mind a strong conviction of their physical, intellectual, and moral superiority over the people of that country. They are so easy to govern. They are so docile, so loyal, so easy to keep down. Even our own advocates here have never tried to seriously disturb this self-complacency of the British people. They have condemned the evils of their Indian administration, but have never pointed out the dangers thereof. They have proclaimed the extreme poverty of the people,—their ignorance, their physical decadence, their economic instability,—and have appealed to the generosity of their rulers, for the redress of these evils. The British people thus know only of the weakness of India, not of her strength.

They know only of her ignorance, but nothing of her intelligence, only of her cowardice, but nothing of her courage, only of her docility, but nothing of her dogged determination. Had they known the country and the people as we do, they would have, most assuredly, taken a very different view of the present situation, a view that would curb the policy of repression and help the course of that peaceful evolution which we are so anxious to promote.

And in the interest of this peaceful progress, so much needed as much for our own good, as for the protection of the enormous economic interests of England in India, it is necessary that we should have a strong bureau here, which will constantly hammer, through the press and the platform, the real facts about India, into the thoughts and attention of the British public. Our appeal will thus lie, not to British generosity, but to the enlightened self-interest of the British democracy. This democracy will not interfere with the policy or acts of its constituted representatives simply in the interest of abstract right or justice. I am yet convinced of it that only if it can be made to realise the serious risks of this policy, it will make itself felt in the counsels of the Empire in a way which no Government will dare to ignore.

There are two things very prominent in the national character of these people, the first is their strong common sense, their regard for material and visible interests; and second their infinite capacity for bullying. The English know how to show fight, such as, perhaps, no other people knows. But they know also how quietly, and with great show of dignity and generosity, to give in to a rival or opponent, when they find it necessary to do so, in order to protect their material interests or to keep up their position and prestige. If they are once convinced that the policy of repression inaugurated by the rulers of India will be bound to lead to serious difficulties and jeopardise both their immense commercial and industrial interests in that country, and their position before the world, they will not hesitate to abandon it, and adopt a more reasonable and conciliatory attitude towards our legitimate aspirations and efforts to be in our own country what other people are in their own. The way in which they have treated the Boers is a glaring illustration of it. The Boers were beaten. England was bound to beat them, after having once declared war against the two Boer Republics. To fail to do so would reduce her position and prestige in the world. She strained every nerve, therefore to conquer these states. But after the war was over, she realised the difficulties of her position as the conqueror, and at once solved the Boer problem in a way, that has practically made the conquered race the red masters of the situation in South Africa, and to day, the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony are autonomous as they were ever before, and are, in addition, able to dictate their own terms, in every matter to their conquerors! It is the bully in the British character that made the war, it is the sense of the practical, in the same character, that has now led to the practical abdication of all the rights and advantages of the conqueror, in favour of the conquered, in that country. Taking note of these fundamental elements of the British national character, I feel that if we can work slowly, steadily, courageously, and with due intelligence and circumspection, on the one side in India, keeping up the movement with all the sacrifices that may be demanded of us by it, from day to day, — working peacefully, lawfully, but with dauntless courage and deathless determination,—giving unto Caesar what is Caesar's and claiming for the people what is theirs,—and thus prove the hopelessness of the attempt to frighten or bully us out of our lawful rights and duties, and on the other, keep up an agitation in England for the dissemination of the truth about India, and for constantly pointing out to the British Public how a reasonable settlement may be arrived at between the two countries, reconciling their reasonable claims and interests, with those of the people, then, I feel confident we shall be able, gradually, to steer clear of the risks of a violent, prolonged, and ruinous revolutionary struggle in our country.

In the meantime all proceedings shall be stopped.

A LAMENTABLE SUICIDE.

Mr. Shariar, a distinguished scientist and engineer for some reason or other, cut off his connection some years ago from Messrs. Burn and Co's Pottery Works at Raneebunge, and formed a syndicate with the help of which he established an extensive pottery works with headquarters at Combulary in the district of Manbhoon. The articles turned out from the new Pottery Works were superior to those of Messrs. Burn and Co's and the latter finding that their articles do not command an extensive sale had to reduce the price of their articles. Mr. Whyte, Manager of Messrs. Burn and Co's Pottery Works persuaded Mr. Shariar to wind up the business and join Messrs. Burn and Co. as partner. On Mr. Shariar refusing to do so, Messrs. Burn and Co. took lease of the Mouzah from a lady and litigation ensued. Mr. Shariar gained his case in the High Court but on appeal to the Privy Council the decision of the High Court was upset. On hearing that Messrs. Burn and Co. have come to take possession of his dear Pottery Works he shot himself to death and thus passed away a man who had started a new industry and was loved by all the influential colliery managers.

SEPARATE MAHOMEDAN ELECTORATE.

In response to requests from all parts of India and with full concurrence of Aga Khan the London Branch of the Moslem League has submitted for consideration of Lord Morley a review of the situation with regard to Mahomedan's electoral claims. It declares that the whole Mahomedans are gratified at the intimation that concerning local self-governing bodies Indian Government's amended proposals do not affect Lord Morley's pledges. They are poignantly disappointed when they reflect that the principle which Lord Morley held to be appropriate to the lower rungs of electoral ladder cannot be applied with similar completeness to higher and more important branches of popular representation. The League points out, separate elections are an existent right in many Municipal areas in Northern India. The aim of Muslims has been throughout to have the the problem treated as a whole. The London Committee discussed Mr. Ali Imama's scheme during the latter's visit to London, but it is unable to favour the scheme which is condemned by overwhelming weight of Moslem opinion as failing to secure real adequate representation. Only a separate register can assure the execution of the principle affirmed in Lord Morley's despatch of 27th November, that Legislative Councils should reflect leading elements of population. The Committee suggests an alternative scheme which mainly follows that submitted to the Viceroy by the Talukdars of Mahmudbad, and says that even the allotment of nine seats on the Viceroyal Legislature to Mahomedans will leave the Hindus in overwhelming majority.

"INDIAN WORLD" AND THE CONGRESS.

The September number of the Indian World has come out with a rejoinder in defence of Bengal's attitude in the matter of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta's election as the President of the next Congress. It declares that the charge levelled against the Bengalee leaders of being petulant, dictatorial and provincial is not only groundless but silly. It further states that if Bengal secede from the next Congress it shall do so from no spirit of personal dislike of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta but from the point of view of the highest patriotism.

QUEEN ANNE'S LODGE.

The "Times" states that negotiations for lease of Queen Anne's lodge near Carlton Hall for the Indian unofficial societies provided for under Lord Morley's scheme, has fallen through owing to refusal of the owners, who are also directors of Queen Anne's mansions. They feared that amenities of residence in their adjoining flats would be impaired thereby. On the other hand, the most important feature of the scheme is already yielding good results. Increasing numbers of students are seeking counsel of adviser. Mr. Arnold who has done much to facilitate prompt admission of students to institutions in England.

POLICE ESPIONAGE.

Some of the accused in the Alipore Bomb Case have already been discharged without the slightest slur on their conduct. Babu Purna Chandra Sen, son of Babu Jogendra Chandra Sen, pleader, Tamlook, was one of them. He is now leaving in Midnapore with his elder brother. Though got off from the clutches of the Calcutta Police, he is not so fortunate as to be above the suspicion of the local police, who are, on their walk to ascertain his whereabouts, as if he were an ordinary criminal. A few days ago, he was even roused more than once at night with the other members of his family.

ALLEGED POLICE TORTURE IN INDIA.

On the British House of Commons Dr. Rutherford asked whether, in view of the findings of the Police Commission Lord Morley had recommended to the Government of India the prohibition of every form of physical and moral torture. The master of Elibank replied that the question conveyed an entirely erroneous impression that police torture was prevalent throughout India and was countenanced by the Government. The Indian Government was doing its utmost to eradicate the abuses, improve discipline and raise that standard of the force which was drawn almost wholly from the general Indian population. It was only fair to the heads of the police to add that their endeavours in this direction were meeting with substantial success.

SRIJIT HIRENDRANATH DUTT AT MYMENSINGH.

On the 29th September Srijit Hiren-dranath Dutt, M. A., B. L., addressed a crowded public meeting held at the Durgabari on religion and education. He was greeted with shouts of Bande Mataram on arrival. He kept the audience spell-bound for one hour. He explained why Hindu religion survived many shocks. He said that education without religious training cannot develop manhood and that education through the medium of foreign language wastes student's energy and retards the development of ideas. The present system teaches word rather than imports. The national system endeavours to remedy these defects. The parents and guardians should co-operate with the National Council and make best education system available to every district. He left for Dacca.

THE ANANDA MOHAN COLLEGE.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Ananda Mohon College at Mymensingh was performed on the 30th September yesterday at 4.30 p. m. by Mr. Blackwood, District Magistrate Maharaj Kumar Sasi Kanta Acharyya, Rajah Jogendra Kishore Roy, his eldest son and all the local officials, pleaders muktears, ministerial officers, teachers and doctors attended the ceremony. Babu Baikuntha Kishore Chakravarti M. A. Principal, in a long report traced the origin of the local City College, its death, and the growth of the new college named after the late Mr. Ananda Mohan Bose. The total fund amounts to one lakh and forty thousand rupees. The Government grant is 65 thousand rupees and donations from zemindars amount to the remaining sum of 75 thousands, 30 thousands being the donation of Rajah Jogendra Kishore Ray of Ramgopalpur on condition that the College be named "the Ananda Mohon College." The public are thankful to Rajah Jogendra Kishore and the Magistrate for this fitting monument of the late Mr. Ananda Mohan Bose. The estimated cost of the college buildings is seventy thousands. The Magistrate in a short speech detailed the future prospects of the College, which he hopes will have a fully equipped science class by amalgamation with the Promotha-Monmotha College of Tangail. The laboratory is to be named after the said zemindars of Santosh, who make a donation of twenty-thousands. Other big donors are:—The late Maharajah Bahadur, five thousands, Maharaj Kumar Sasi Kanta Acharyya fifteen thousands, Babu Hem Chandra Choudhury ten thousands, Babu Jagat Kishore Acharyya Chowdhury five and a half thousands.

PROHIBITING PROCESSION.

We hear Babu Bishnupada Mukerjee of Bhowanipur Calcutta has served a notice upon Babu Girish Chandra Roy Police Inspector Chandpore, to the effect that he Bishnupada Babu felt a good deal of mental agony and suffered greatly in the estimation of the public for the measure the Inspector took with some Sub-Inspectors and a posse of constables in dispersing a lawful procession by preventing him from proceeding in the King's high way singing national songs accompanied by a few gentlemen of the locality without any legal authority or justification, for not taking license from the Municipality which was not necessary. He therefore asked the Inspector to apologise to him for this act within a week or he would put the matter into the hands of the lawyer.

THE MEMORISING NATIONAL SCHOOL.

On the 28th September at the Golakpur Lodge a Conference for deliberations about the national system of education was held. Mr. W. C. Ghose, Barrister Babus Shama Charan Roy, Anath Bandu Guha, Rohat Mohan Guha and many other pleaders, muktears, doctors and other respectable citizens were present. Balu Hirendra Nath Dutt, M. A. B. L. attorney, and Babu Mon Mohan Bhattacharji, M. A. impressed the audience with the utility of national education. The former fully explained that under the present University system 80 per cent of students were not likely attain success. For them the national system may open suitable avenues. Therefore the local National School should be well equipped. 5,000 rupees as subscription were promised on the spot: Balu Anath Bandu Guha Rs. 1000; Babu Mohin Chandra Roy Rs. 1200; Babu Jagatjiban Roy, Rs. 250; others Rs. 100 or less. This subscription is intended for the building fund only. The late Maharajah Bhadur made a gift of a site. The Conference was a grand success. Rs. 20,000 is required for the school building and other equipments.

MAHAMMADANS AND GOVERNMENT.

The Frontier Advocate of the 23rd, publishes the details of the forcible conversion of three Hindu minor boys, which if true, well illustrates the miserable plight of our co-religionists in the Frontier Province. About a fortnight ago (from the 23rd) a Mahammadan teacher of the Boys' School in Miran Shah (Tochi Valley); forcibly converted two Hindu pupils, between 12 and 14 years of age, to Islam. The boys' parents reported the matter to Mr. Keen the popular Political Agent who sent for the teacher and the Lambardars of the place. They informed the Agent that the boys had accepted Islam of their free will. Mr. Keen told the headmen that he would keep the boys with himself for some time and try to know of their religious ideas and see whether they had voluntarily accepted the religion of the Prophet. The men retired for the time being to their village. Shortly after, however, collecting a large group of armed villagers they repaired to the Government camp with drums beating and trumpets blowing. Hearing the noise Mr. Keen enquired of the sardars of the Border Militia the reason of these hilarious proceedings. He got the reply that the music formed the accompaniment and panoply of an advancing marriage party. The crowd eventually approached and began to fire at the Camp. Then the sardars told the Agent that the crowd was bent on fight thereupon Mr. Keen ordered his militia to oppose the raiders. The sardars replied that as it was a religious matter they could not carry out his orders. Mr. Keen instantly realised the gravity of the situation. On the advice of the Tahsildar it is said the Political Officer made over the boys to the raiders. To the Hindus, who appeared to have remonstrated against the hasty proceedings, he is said to have stated that if this were not done his own life would have been in grave danger.

The Frontier Advocate assures its readers that the incident has created quite a sensation among the Hindu population of dera Ismail Khan where several private letters have been received from their co-religionist at miran Shah of their sad lot shortly after this incident Mr Keen left for Nathia Gulla probably to see the chief commissioner. The result of Mr. Keen's interview with sir G. Roos Koppe is anxiously awaited by the entire Hindu population of the North-Western Frontier province.

A YOUNG EGYPT CONGRESS

One hundred and twenty Egyptian delegates, also some members of the House of Commons, including Mr. Keir Hardie, Mr. G. N. Barnes, and Mr. T. M. Kettle, the Irish Nationalist, attended the Young Egypt Congress at Geneva. Mohamed Farid Bey, the leader of the Egyptian National Party, declared that the people of Egypt would never ask Great Britain for a Constitution. They would ask the Khedive for it, and they would soon obtain it. Mohamed Alaidy read a paper in English asserting that it was not England's business to put down anarchy in Egypt any more than in Mexico or Poland.

A telegram was despatched from Congress reminding the Commons of Great Britain's reiterated promise to evacuate Egypt. A message was also sent to Hilmi Pasha, Grand Vizier of the Ottoman Empire begging him to use his influence with Great Britain to secure the withdrawal of the latter's troops from Egypt. Mr. Kettle assured the gathering of Ireland's sympathy with this Egyptians in their present struggle, England, he added, had outstayed the welcome in Egypt. Mr. Keir Hardie promised to defend Egypt's cause in the House of Commons.

A MEETING AT CAIRO.

An orderly demonstration attended by several thousands of persons was held at Cairo. As a result of the gathering, a telegram was despatched to Mr. Asquith protesting against the British occupation of the country and declaring that the Egyptians relied upon the engagements and solemn oaths of the late Queen's Government. To gain our friendship is the message stated, more preferable to English honour than to lose our hearts and support. A telegram was also sent to Hilmi Pasha.

SEDITION CASE IN SIND.

All of a sudden, Mr. Shillidy, Sub-divisional Magistrate Rohri, accompanied by Mr. Hiranand, Sub-Inspector and 3 or 4 other police men arrived at the Edward Press Sukkur owned by Mr. Virumal Begraj on the morning of Friday at about 10 A. M. The Sub-Inspector Mr. Hiranand informed Mr. Virumal that he held a non bailable warrant of arrest from the Subdivisional Magistrate Shikarpur-Sukkur and another for the search of this press to discover booklets or pamphlets or purporting to be the translation of Tilak's Swadeshi writings made by Chetumal proprietor, Swadeshi shop, Sukkur. Mr. Virumal allowed the search to be made and pointed to them the books that were needed. Mr. Shillidy was at the press till 4 p. m., he removed all papers under seal as it was intended to sort the papers afterwards. All kinds of letters and papers have been taken away though not covered by the warrant. Mr. Virumal's family house was simultaneously searched under warrant by Mr. Gillespie Police Inspector. The house where Chetumal lived and the Swadeshi shop he owned were searched. Both were arrested and taken to the Collectorate where the accused and Mr. Manley A. S. P. remained for some time. Thence the accused were produced before Mr. Milne, Sub-divisional Magistrate, Shikarpur, who remanded the accused and fixed the trial for 1st October. Mr. Parmanand, Public Prosecutor appeared for the Crown and the accused Mr. Virumal was represented by Messrs. Bhojising and Murlidhar, pleaders. An application for bail made to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate at about 1-30 was rejected; but as he very kindly granted true copies of the papers immediately the application was renewed before the Sessions Judge, Mr. Boyd. He issued notice to the Crown pleader and the District Magistrate.

The application was heard by the Sessions Judge, Mr. Boyd in court, where the Crown was represented by Mr. Parmanand, Public Prosecutor, assisted by the complainant Mr. Manley, Assistant Superintendent of Police. The application for bail was opposed by the Public Prosecutor under instructions from the District Magistrate. Statement of facts in the application that in this particular case, Mr. Virumal acted with the District Magistrate rather than against the Government was not seriously contested. The Court was overcrowded and the Sessions Judge ordered Mr. Virumal to be released on bail and furnish a surety of Rs. 10,000 with a bond in a like sum.

At 3 o'clock he got a letter from the S. D. M., Rohri, requiring him to attend the Collectorate where the papers taken away would be sorted.

The other accused Bhai Chetumal was also ordered to be released on bail by Mr. Boyd on his furnishing a surety for a similar sum.

BOMBAY PRARTHANA SOMAJ.*JUSTICE CHNDAVARKAR'S*LECTURE.*"DARKNESS OR DAWN"

In connection with the forty second anniversary of the local Prarthana Samaj Justice Chandavarkar last evening delivered an address on the "Darkness or Dawn" before a crowded audience. The lecturer in course of the address gave an interesting account of the establishment of Brahma Samaj in Bengal and the Prarthana Samaj in Bombay with political associations with nationality for their watch word. He said they were not only where they had been forty years back but perhaps they had gone even further backward and the signs of the times were such as to make one feel despondent about the future of his country. Lord Morley gave them reforms and first signly which they were followed in the country was that the Mahomedans came forward and said they must have separate representation. Controversies ensued with the result that Hindu Sabhas were established and now they had organisations which on the one hand professed to protect the interests of the Hindus, while the other party the Mahomedan Associations professed to protect the interests of the Mahomedans. True Hindus, and Mahomedans had in a way been divided 35 or 40 years ago but the separation had not been so pointed as it now had become. And here they had sectarianism and dissension in the most pointed form. The question suggested to them was whether it was darkness or whether it was dawn. It was not to the Mahomedans alone that this separation was confined. But if they went to the Hindus they would find that they had been divided in the house. Every community and every caste had now come to the front and said they must also have separate representation. He also referred to the Lingayat and Jain communities, who, the speaker said, did no longer wish to be recognized as an integral portion of the great Hindu community; and he summed up the matter by saying that if there was one thing which was prominently forcing itself on their attention it was the fact that this sectarianism seemed to be the order of the day.

Continuing, the lecturer said, there was a good deal of doubt in what was happening amongst them to damp their spirits to make them feel disappointed and to think that after all was said and done it was not progress but retrogression with which they were faced. Sectarianism was no doubt a mark of retrogression. But as a student of history, as one who drew his faith from God, from humanity and his belief in progress being the order of the day in the kingdom of providence, he felt that the signs which they were witnessing so far from being depressing signs were themselves that signs they were on the path of progress. The events that were happening before them seemed to be rather a sign of darkness but still it was darkness before dawn. Whether however it would be darkness continued or whether it would be dawn that followed darkness upon them upon him and upon every one.]

"SWARAJ" SEDITION. JUDGMENT RESERVED.

Justices Chandravarkar and Heaton heard arguments on the rule taken out by Ganesh Bulwant Modak to set aside the order of Mr. Aston, Chief Presidency Magistrate. Accused Modak was charged before the Magistrate under Section 124A. of the Indian Penal Code with having published in India a fortnightly magazine, called "Swaraj," which contained an article "Etiology of Bomb in Bengal" and was sentenced to one month's simple imprisonment.

Mr. J. Baptista appeared in support of the rule. Mr. Strangman, Advocate-General, instructed by the Public Prosecutor, appeared to show cause against the rule.

Mr. Baptista said, the only question the Court had to decide was whether the facts proved constituted publication. His client received advance copies of the "Swaraj." They were sent to the Collector who read and passed them and they were then sold by the accused. What the accused said was that he had no time to read the article and that he had no knowledge that the article contained seditious matter.

Chandravarkar, J.: Your argument then is that publication required intention. Accused had sold them but had not read the contents, and therefore there was no publication in law.

Mr. Baptista said the Magistrate had held that there was no evidence to show any person to whom they were sold had read the contents. That, the Magistrate held, was not necessary under Section 125A. But the Magistrate thought, that would be necessary for a charge of defamation.

Chandravarkar, J.: Having regard to all the surrounding circumstances and the times of unrest under which this country was passing, why should we not infer that the persons in whose hands they came had read them?

Mr. Baptista: The jury would in that case only come to this inference. In order to constitute a publication three things ought to be established according to the well-known authority of Odgers. The possessor must have read them, he must have read and delivered them to others, and the party to whom they were delivered must have read them.

Mr. Baptista added, accused had received advance copies by post and the consignment was with the Collector of Customs. When his client received the books from the Collector after being approved, accused sold them and they were all disposed of in two hours and not a single copy was left with his client.

Heaton, J.: Is there any evidence when they were received?

Mr. Strangman said they were received on July 22nd.

Heaton, J.: How did he receive advance copies?

Mr. Baptista: By post.

Heaton, J.: What is your client?

Mr. Baptista: He is the manager of the "Rashtramat" and is also manager Bartaman Agency.

Heaton, J.: If it is admitted that he disposed of all the copies the inevitable inference is that they must have been read by the people who received them.

Mr. Justice Chandravarkar said the prosecution could not prove by direct evidence who had read the article, but taking all the surrounding circumstances into consideration and the time of unrest during which they were sent, a presumption did arise that they must have been read by the persons who had received them.

Mr. Baptista said if the contents were not read by the person who sent it, it would not be publication within the meaning of the Section. The grounds on which the Magistrate held the article to be published was the notice which accused admitted he had read.

Heaton, J.: The meaning of the pronouncement in the notice was clear and it referred to spread of sedition.

Chandravarkar, J.: The whole question was whether the article was seditious or not.

Mr. Baptista said the important question the Court had to decide was the intention of the person who sent the article. The jury would not be bound to say that it was the intention of the accused to excite hatred against the Government.

Mr. Baptista showed a distinction between "calculated to excite hatred" and "intention" and cited cases in support of his arguments.

The Advocate-General having replied their Lordships reserved judgment.

TRAVANCORE POLICE.

The case of five policemen, who were convicted of offences of torture, unlawful detention in custody, etc., in connection with the arrests made in June last year soon after the riot has already been reported. The convicted policemen appealed before the District and Sessions Judge, who quashed the conviction of the Magistrate, acquitted the three policemen and ordered the retrial of two others. It is reported that soon after their conviction by the Magistrate orders were issued by the Superintendent of Police to an Inspector to render all necessary help to the policemen convicted, engage a vakil and prefer an appeal. This order of the Superintendent was, it is alleged, followed by a confidential circular to all the Inspectors asking them to give certain percentage of their pay and also realise the same percentage from their subordinates. The circular was signed by the Police Inspector in charge of the Superintendent's Office. A good deal of protest was made by the local Press against this extraordinary procedure, the attention of Government being called. Notwithstanding the strong adverse criticisms in the Press about the circular no official contradiction has so far appeared.

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION,

BHISMA ;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilized languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world:—they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties,—religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI PARVAM of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvams.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS—THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST, SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTIONS—Each Part per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis rests the great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book in such lucid way that even a boy will be able to grasp its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2.8. Rebound Bk. 1-8. Postage Extra.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Gokhale's Apologia.

We do not think we need waste much space on the arguments of the recent speech in which Mr Gokhale has attempted to reconcile the contradictory utterances in which his speeches have lately abounded. Vibhishan's utterances are of little importance nowadays to anyone except the Government and Anglo-India, who are naturally disposed to make the most of his defection from the cause of the people. Justice Chandavarkar, who long ago gave up the cause of his country for a judgeship and whose present political opinions can be estimated from his remarks in the Swaraj case, grandiloquently condemned the "vilification" to which Mr Gokhale has been exposed, and declared that condemnation from such quarters was the greatest compliment a man like his protegee could have. Of course the worthy judge could not foresee that the Englishman would hail the first Servant of India as a brand plucked from the burning and compliment him on being the only righteous and right-thinking man among Indian politicians, —which is after all a little hard on Sir Pherozshah Mehta and Mr. Har-kissendlal. But in the same report that enshrines Mr. Chandavarkar's semi-official rhetoric we have it that the Commissioner of Police and his deputy were present to support the speaker with their moral influence and loudly applauded his sentiments. Surely this was a yet greater compliment to Mr. Gokhale,—the greatest he could receive. And if we suppose, with the Bombay Judge, that the condemnation of his countrymen is an honour for which the erstwhile popular leader eagerly pants, surely the support and loud applause of the two highest police officials in the land,—and one of them his old friend, Mr. Vincent, of whom he must have pleasant memories connected with his famous apology to the British army,—must have been yet dearer to the statesman's heart. Only three things are noteworthy in the speech itself. Mr. Gokhale fervently declares that it is not only the duty of every Indian to shun religiously all aspirations towards independence, but also to rush to the defence of the Government when it is attacked. This explains Mr. Gokhale's recent speeches. It is a pity that he awoke to the sense of his duty so late, otherwise, not being overburdened by a sense of consistency he might have rushed to the help of the Government against himself when he was loudly advocating political Boycott and even outdistancing the most extreme Nationalist by suggesting the refusal of payment of taxes. The second thing we note, is the remarkable statement that even if we try to use peaceful methods, the Government will not long allow them to retain their peaceful character. This can mean only that the Government will deliberately force the advocates of Indian freedom to use violent means by persecuting the use of lawful and peaceful methods. We had recently to dissent from a much more limited suggestion by Sj. Bepin Pal, but an aspersion of this kind from Mr. Gokhale, not on officials but on the Government whom he is supporting so thoroughly in their policy, is amazing. Truly, Mr. Gokhale hardly seems to know what discretion means. In the same way he tried to teach the young men of India, among whom he admits that the gospel of independence has gained immense ground, that violence was the only road to the realisation of their cherished ideal. Finally, we find Mr. Gokhale appealing to the people of this country to give up their ideals from personal self-interest and the danger of harassment and martyrdom which attends the profession and pursuit of the new politics. Truly has a mighty teacher arisen in India! We could have passed by an argument based on the doubt whether our course was right and helpful to the country, but this sordid appeal to the lowest motives in humanity, selfishness and cowardice, makes one's gorge rise. And this is the man who claims, we hear, to have preceded the Nationalists as a prophet of self-sacrifice and the cult of the motherland. Well may we echo the cry of the Israelites malcontents, "These be thy gods, O Israel!"

The People's Proclamation.

In our last issue we commented on the importance and significance of the People's Proclamation as part of the celebration of the 16th October. It is a curious irony of Fate that, immediately afterwards, it should have been deliberately decided by our leaders to drop the Proclamation from the proceedings. We do not know in what particular quarter of that quaking morass of fears and apprehensions which is called the mind of our leaders, or in answer to what particular touch the tremour arose which has manifested itself in this amazing excoision. The mutilated copy of last year's circular which is disgraced by this act of inexplicable backsliding and timidity, comes out under the signatures of Sjts. Surendranath Banerji, Motilal Ghose and Riji Jotindranath Chaudhuri. We are certainly astonished to find Moti Babu's name under such a document and we can only assume that it was asserted without getting his consent or that consent was asked and given by telegraph from Deoghur without his being informed of the omission. Originally, there was another honoured name in that place, but the gentleman who bore it declined to sign unless the omission was rectified, and Moti Babu's name seems to have been thrust in at the last moment in order to fill up the gap,—a proceeding not very complimentary to one of the first living names in Bengal. Nor do we quite understand how Rai Jotindranath Chaudhuri induced himself to be a consenting party to the omission, if indeed he knew of it. Be that as it may, the Nationalist leaders will do their duty in opposing this act of culpable weakness. But we are curious to know how the people will take it. Their attitude will be some sign of the present altitude of the political thermometer. The tone and temper of the movement showed a distinct rise till the Hughly Conference, subsequently it seems to have been sinking. And no wonder, with such leadership. Even a nation of strong men led by the weak, blind or selfish, becomes easily infected with the vices of its leaders. And the strength of Bengal though immensely increased, is not yet the perfect and tempered steel that it must become, hard as adamant and light in the lifting.

The Anusilan Samiti.

The proclamation of the Anusilan Samiti in Calcutta is one of the most autocratic and unjustifiable acts that the bureaucracy have yet committed. The Calcutta Samiti has distinguished itself, since the beginning of its career, by the rigidity with which it has enforced its rule of not mixing as an association with current politics and confining itself to such activities as were not only objectionable, but of such a nature that even the most autocratic Government, provided it had the least sympathy with the moral and physical improvement of its subjects, must wholly approve. Its original and main motive has been the improvement of the physique in the race, and there has been no instance in which the Samiti has gone beyond its function as a physical training institution or tried to use the improved physique for any combined purpose. Beyond this the main activities have been turned to the help of the Police and the public on such occasions as the Ardho-day Yog, to the organisation of famine relief, in which the Samiti has done splendid work, and recently to other action recommended by the Government itself. We believe it has even to a certain extent enjoyed the approbation of high European officials. It is indeed an ironical comment on the demand for co-operation that the only great association born of the new movement which has shown any anxiety to depart from a line of strict independent activity and co-operate with the Government, should have been selected, at this time of peace and quiet, for proclamation on the extraordinary ground that it interferes in some undefined and mysterious way with the administration of the law. Advocates of co-operation, take note. Meanwhile what can the man in the street conclude except that the Government is determined to allow no organisation to exist among the Bengalis which has the least trace in it of self-help, training and patriotic effort? For no explanation is vouchsafed of this arbitrary act. In an august and awful silence the gods of Belvidere hurl their omnipotent paper thunderbolts, careless of what mere men may think, confident in their self-arrogated attributes of omnipotence, omniscience and omni-benevolence, a divine, irresistible and irresponsible mystery.

The National Fund.

We have received a letter from Mr A. C. Sen of Delhi in which he recommends that the National Fund should be utilised for a Swadeshi Museum. The necessity of such an institution has been engaging our attention for some time, and no one can dispute the immense advantages that will accrue from it; but the institution, if properly conceived and managed, needs only a small initial fund for its support in the first stages of its existence and will soon become self-supporting. It is quite unnecessary to divert to it a large sum like the National Fund. Meanwhile, if we allow divided counsels to obtain as to the disposal of the fund, the only result will be that it will remain where it is, useless and unused. We note that the opposition to the proposal unanimously passed at Hughly emanates from a few individuals whose justification for professing to speak in the name of the subscribers is not yet clear. The Anglo-Indian papers who are interested in preventing the erection of the hall, and, among Indian papers, the Hindu Patriot, the Indian Minor and the Indian Nation, all of them papers of a very limited circulation and opposed to the national movement in its most vital features. We are not aware that any organ of the popular party, Moderate or Nationalist, has opposed the sense of the country as formulated in Sji. Surendranath Banerji's resolution at Hughly.

THE REVIVAL OF INDIAN ART.

The Main Difference.

The greatness of Indian art is the greatness of all Indian thought and achievement. It lies in the recognation of the persistent within the transient, of the domination of matter by spirit, the subordination of the insistent appearances of Prakriti to the inner reality which, in a thousand ways, the Mighty Mother veils even while she suggests. The European artist, caged within the narrow confines of the external, is dominated in imagination by the body of things and the claims of the phenomenon. Western painting starts from the eye or the imagination; its master word is either beauty or reality, and, according as he is the slave of his eye or the playfellow of his imagination, the painter produces a photograph or a poem. But, in painting, the European imagination seldom travels beyond an imaginative interpretation or variation of what the physical eye has seen. Imitation is the keyword of creation, according to Aristotle; Shakespeare advises the artist to hold up the mirror to Nature; and the Greek scientist and the English poet reflect accurately the mind of Europe.

But the Indian artist has been taught by his philosophy and the spiritual discipline of his forefathers that the imagination is only a channel and an instrument of some source of knowledge and inspiration that is greater and higher; by meditation or by Yoga he seeks within himself that ultimate centre of knowledge where there is direct and utter vision of the thing that lies hidden in the forms of man, animal, tree, river, mountain. It is this sumyag jnan, this sakshat darshan, the utter, revealing and apocalyptic vision, that he seeks, and when he has found it, whether by patient receptivity or sudden inspiration, his whole aim is to express it utterly and revealingly in line and colour. Form is only a means of expressing the spirit, and the one thought of the artist should be how best to render the spiritual vision. He is not bound by the forms that compose the world of gross matter, though he takes them as a starting-point for his formal expression of the vision within him; if by modifying them or departing from them he can reveal that vision more completely, his freedom and his duty as an artist emancipate him from the obligation of the mere recorder and copyist. The ancient Asiatic artists were not incapable of reproducing outward Nature with as perfect and vigorous an accuracy as the Europeans; but it was their ordinary method deliberately to suppress all that might hamper the expression of their spiritual vision.

Reality for its own sake, one of the most dominant notes of Art in Europe, Indian artistic theory would not have recognised; for we have always regarded the reality of the Europeans as an appearance; to us the true reality is that which is hidden; otherwise, there would be no need of the prophet, the philosopher, the poet and the artist. It is they who see with the sukshma drishti, the inner vision, and not like the ordinary man with the eye only. Beauty for beauty's sake, the other great note of European Art is recognised by us, but not in the higher work of the artist. Just as in the first ideal, the tyranny of the eye is acknowledged, so in the second the tyranny of the aesthetic imagination. The Indian seeks freedom, and the condition of freedom is the search for ultimate Truth. But in this search the imagination is an unsafe and capricious guide; it misinterprets as often as it interprets. The claim of the eye to separate satisfaction can only be answered by the response of decorative beauty; the claim of the imagination to separate satisfaction can only receive the response of fancy playing with scene and legend, form and colour, idea and dream, for pure aesthetic delight; but in the interpretation of things the eye and the imagination can assert no right to command, they are only subordinate instruments and must keep their place. Whenever, therefore, the Indian artist put away from him his high spiritual aim, it was to seek decorative beauty informed by the play of the imagination. Here he held decorative beauty to be his paramount aim and declined to be bound by the seen and the familiar. If by other lines than the natural, by subtler or richer methods than those of outward Nature, our old masters could gain in decorative suggestion and beauty, they held themselves free to follow their inspiration. Here, too, they often deliberately changed and suppressed in order to get their desired effect. If they had been asked to deny themselves this artistic gain for the sake of satisfying the memory in the physical eye, they would have held the objector to be the bondsman of an unmeaning superstition.

We of today have been overpowered by the European tradition as interpreted by the English, the least artistic of civilised nations. We have therefore come to make on a picture the same demand as on a photograph,—the reproduction of the thing as the eye sees it, not even as the retrospective mind or the imagination sees it, exact resemblance to the beings or objects we know, or, if anything more, then a refinement on Nature in the direction of greater picturesqueness and prettiness and the satisfaction of the lower and more external sense of beauty. The conception that Art exists not to copy, but for the sake of a deeper truth and vision, and we must seek in it not the object but God in the object, not things but the soul of things, seems to have vanished for a while from the Indian consciousness.

Another obstacle to the appreciation of great art, to which even those Indians who are not dominated by European ideas are liable, is the exaggerated respect for the symbols and traditions which our art or literature has used at a certain stage of development. I am accustomed for instance to a particular way of representing Shiva or Kali and I refuse to have any other. But the artist has nothing to do with my prejudices. He has to represent the essential truth of Shiva or Kali, that which makes their Shiva hood or Kali hood, and he is under no obligation to copy the vision of others. If he has seen another vision of Shiva or Kali, it is that vision to which he must be faithful. The curious discussion which arose recently as to the propriety or otherwise of representing the gods without beard or moustache, is an instance of this literalism which is a survival of the enslavement to form and rule characteristic of the eighteenth century. The literalist cannot see that it is not the moustache or beard or the symbol which makes the godhead, but the divine greatness, immortal strength, beauty, youth, purity or peace within. It is that godhead which the artist must draw and paint, and in the forms he chooses he is bound only by the vision in dhyana. Whether his interpretation will gain an abiding place in the thought and imagination of the race, depends on its power to awake the deeper vision in the race. All that we can demand is that it shall be a real God, a real Shiva, a real Kali, and not a freak of his imagination or an outcome of some passing sanskara of his education or artistic upbringing. He must go to the fountainhead of knowledge within himself or his claim to freedom does not stand. It has already been said that the condition of freedom is the search for truth, and the artist must not allow his imagination to take the place of the higher quality.

Indian Art demands of the artist the power of communion with the soul of things, the sense of spiritual taking precedence of the sense of material beauty, and fidelity to the deeper vision within of the lover of art it demands the power to see the spirit in things, the openness of mind to follow a developing tradition, and the sattwic passivity, discharged of prejudgments, which opens luminously to the secret intention of the picture and is patient to wait until it attains a perfect and profound divination.

UNION DAY.

The 16th of October is generally known as the Partition Day, and it is inevitable that, so long as the administrative division stands, this feature should be emphasised. Especially now that the Reforms threaten to make the division in our administrative lives permanent and real, a mournful significance attaches to the celebration this year. It is possible that, before the day comes round again, the fatal complaisance and weakness of leaders and people may have effected the division between East and West Bengal which the hand of Lord Curzon attempted in vain. The Reform drives in the thin end of the wedge, the rulers know how to trust to time and national cowardice and inertia to do the rest. But if we can overcome the temptation as we overcome the intimidation, the 16th of October will take its place among the national festivals of the future under the name of Union Day.

The unity of Bengal was almost complete when Lord Curzon struck his blow, but there were defects, little fissures which might under untoward circumstances develop into great and increasing cracks. Lord Curzon's blow devised in a spirit of Machiavellian statesmanship, but delivered in a fit of unstatesmanlike haste and fury, instead of splitting asunder, soldered Bengali unity into a perfect whole. Bengal one and indivisible came into existence on the 16th of October. The indivisibility has yet to be confirmed by withstanding the covert and subtle pressure of the reformed Councils, but, even if for a moment there is backsliding, the young hold the future and in their hearts Bengal is one and indivisible.

The unity of India has been slowly prepared by the pressure from above and the erosion of a reaction from below. It is only by that reaction giving birth to a self-conscious democracy aspiring towards oneness and freedom and reliant on its own manhood, that the dream of an United India can be materialised. The publication of the People's Proclamation on the 16th was the first self-conscious utterance of such a democracy, as yet imperfect and inchoate but aware of its separate existence and conscious of its potential strength. That democracy is now alive in Bengal and Maharashtra, it is struggling to get existence in Punjab and Madras and, to a slighter extent, in the other provinces. When it is fully awake all over India, the unity of the whole country will be within sight. On the 16th of October, in the People's Proclamation, the first condition of an United India was created.

There is yet another unity which is as yet only dimly symbolised in the ceremony of the Rakhi, a unity which cannot come into being until a perfect comradeship in aspiration, in struggle, in suffering shall have been created throughout the length and breadth of the land, — the unity in national comradeship of the children of one mighty Mother, whatever their class or condition, — Indian fraternity based on Indian liberty and Indian equality.

THE BRAIN OF INDIA. II.

A new centre of thought implies a new centre of education. The system now prevailing in our universities is one which ignores the psychology of man, loads the mind laboriously with numerous little packets of information carefully tied with red tape, and, by the methods used in this loading process, damages or atrophies the faculties and instruments by which man assimilates, creates and grows in intellect, manhood and energy. The new National Education seeks immensely to enlarge the field of knowledge to which the student is introduced, and, in so far as it lays stress on experiment and observation, employs the natural and easy instrument of the vernacular and encourages the play of thought on the subjects of study, has corrected the habit of spoiling the instruments of knowledge by the use of false methods. But many of the vicious methods and ideas employed by the old system are faithfully cherished by the new, and the domination of the Council by men wedded to the old lines is likely to have an unfavourable effect on the integrity of the system in its most progressive features. Another vital defect of the new education is that it has increased the amount of information the student is required to absorb without strengthening the body and brain sufficiently to grapple with the increased mass of intellectual toil, and it shares with the old system the defect of ignoring the psychology of the race. The mere inclusion of the matter of Indian thought and culture in the field of knowledge does not make a system of education Indian, and the instruction given in the Bengal National College is an improved European system, not Indian or national. Another error which has to be avoided and to which careless minds are liable, is the reactionary idea that, in order to be national, education must reproduce the features of the old talim system of Bengal. It is not eighteenth century India, the India which by its moral and intellectual deficiencies gave itself into the keeping of foreigners, that we have to revive, but the spirit, ideals and methods of the ancient and mightier India in a yet more effective form and with a more modern organisation.

What was the secret of that gigantic intellectuality, spirituality and superhuman moral force which we see pulsating in the Ramayana and Mahabharata, in the ancient philosophy, in the supreme poetry, art, sculpture and architecture of India? What was at the basis of the incomparable public works and engineering achievements, the opulent and exquisite industries, the great triumphs of science, scholarship, jurisprudence, logic, metaphysics, the unique social structure? What supported the heroism and self-abandonment of the Kshatriya, the Sikh and the Rajput, the unconquerable national vitality and endurance? What was it that stood behind that civilisation second to none in the massiveness of its outlines or the perfection of its details? Without a great and unique discipline involving a perfect education of soul and mind, a result so immense and persistent would have been impossible. It would be an error to look for the secret of Aryan success in the details of the instruction given in the old asrams and universities, so far as they have come down to us. We must know what was the principle and basis on which the details were founded. We shall find the secret of their success in a profound knowledge of human psychology and its subtle application to the methods of intellectual training and instruction.

At the basis of the old Aryan system was the all-important principle of Brahmacharya. The first necessity for the building up of a great intellectual superstructure is to provide a foundation strong enough to bear it. Those systems of education which start from an insufficient knowledge of man, think they have provided a satisfactory foundation when they have supplied the student with a large or well-selected mass of information on the various subjects which comprise the best part of human culture at the time. The school gives the materials, it is for the student to use them, — this is the formula. But the error here is fundamental. Information cannot be the foundation of intelligence, it can only be part of the material out of which the knower builds knowledge, the starting-point, the nucleus of fresh discovery and enlarged creation. An education that confines itself to imparting knowledge is no education. The various faculties of memory, judgment, imagination, perception, reasoning, which build the edifice of thought and knowledge for the knower, must not only be equipped with their fit and sufficient tools and materials, but trained to bring fresh materials and use more skilfully those of which they are in possession. And the foundation of the structure they have to build, can only be the provision of a fund of force and energy sufficient to bear the demands of a continually growing activity of the memory, judgment and creative power. Where is that energy to be found?

The ancient Aryans knew that man was not separate from the universe, but only a homogeneous part of it, just as a wave is part of the Ocean. An infinite energy, Prakriti, Maya or Shakti, pervades the world and pours itself into every name and form, and the clod, the plant, the insect, the animal, the man are, in their phenomenal existence, merely less and more efficient adharas of this Energy. We are each of us a dynamo into which waves of that energy have been generated and stored, and are being perpetually conserved, used up and replenished. The same force which moves in the star and the planet, moves in us, and all our thought and action are merely its play and born of the complexity of its functionings. There are processes by which man can increase his capacity as an adhara. There are other processes by which he can clear of obstructions the channel of communication between himself and the universal energy and bring greater and greater stores of it pouring into his soul and brain and body. This continual improvement of the adhara and increase in quantity and complexity of action of the informing energy, is the whole aim of evolution. When that energy is the highest in kind and the fullest in amount of which the human adhara is capable, and the adhara itself is trained utterly to bear the inrush and play of the energy then is a man siddha, the fulfilled or perfect man; his evolution is over and he has completed in the individual that utmost development which the mass of humanity is labouring towards through the ages.

If this theory be correct, the energy at the basis of the operations of intelligence must be in ourselves and it must be capable of greater expansion and richer use to an extent practically unlimited. And this also must be a sound principle, that the more we can increase and enrich the energy, the greater will be the potential range, power and activity of the functions of our mind and the consequent vigour of our intellectual ability and the greatness of our achievement. This was the first principle on which the ancient Aryans based their education and one of the chief processes which they used for the increased storage of energy, was the practice of Brahmacharya.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER VII.

Mohendra rose from the floor of the inn where he was sitting, for nothing could be gained by sitting there and thinking over his loss. He started in the direction of the town with the idea of taking the help of the officials in the search for his wife and child. After journeying for some distance he saw in the road a number of bullock-carts surrounded by a great company of sepoy.

In the Bengali year 1175 the province of Bengal had not become subject to British administration. The English were then the revenue officials of Bengal. They collected the taxes due to the treasury, but up to that time they had not taken upon themselves the burden of protecting the life and property of the Bengali people. The burden they had accepted was to take the country's money; the responsibility of protecting life and property lay upon that despicable traitor and disgrace to humanity, Mirzafar. Mirzafar was incapable of protecting even himself; it was not likely that he would or could protect the people of Bengal. Mirzafar took opium and slept; the English raked in the rupees and wrote despatches; as for the people of Bengal they wept and went to destruction.

The taxes of the province were therefore the due of the English, but the burden of administration was on the Nawab. Wherever the English themselves collected the taxes due to them, they had appointed a collector, but the revenue collected went to Calcutta. People might die of starvation, but the collection of their monies did not stop for a moment. However, very much could not be collected; for if Mother Earth does not yield wealth, no one can create wealth out of nothing. Be that as it may, the little that could be collected, had been made into cartloads and was on its way to the Company's treasury at Calcutta in charge of a military escort. At this time there was great danger from dacoits, so fifty armed sepoy marched with fixed bayonets, ranked before and behind the carts. Their captain was an English soldier who went on horseback in the rear of the force. On account of the heat the sepoy did not march by day but only by night. As they marched, Mohendra's progress was stopped by the treasure carts and this military array. Mohendra, seeing his way barred by sepoy and carts, stood at the side of the road; but as the sepoy still jostled him in passing, holding this to be no fit time for debate, he went and stood at the edge of the jungle by the road.

Then a sepoy said in Hindustani, "See, there's a dacoit making off." The sight of the gun in Mohendra's hand confirmed this belief. He went for Mohendra, caught hold of his neck and, with the salutation "Rogue thief!" suddenly gave him a blow of the fist and wrested the gun from his hand. Mohendra, empty-handed, merely returned the blow. Needless to say, Mohendra was something more than a little angry, and the worthy sepoy reeled with the blow and went down stunned on the road. Upon that, three or four sepoy came up, took hold of Mohendra and, dragging him forcibly to the commander, told the Sahib, "This man has killed one of the sepoy." The Sahib was smoking and a little bewildered with strong drink; he replied, "Catch hold of the rogue and marry him." The soldiers did not understand how they were to marry an armed highwayman, but in the hope that, with the passing of the intoxication, the Sahib would change his mind and the marriage would not be forced on them, three or four sepoy bound Mohendra hand and foot with the halters of the cart bullocks and lifted him into the cart. Mohendra saw that it would be vain to use force against so many, and, even if he could effect his escape by force, what was the use? Mohendra was depressed and sorrowful with grief for his wife and child and had no desire for life. The sepoy bound Mohendra securely to the wheel of the cart. Then with a slow and heavy stride the escort proceeded on its march.

CHAPTER VIII

Possessed of the ascetic's command, Bhavananda, softly crying the name of Hari, went in the direction of the inn where Mohendra had been sitting; for he thought it likely that there he would get a clue to Mohendra's whereabouts.

At that time the present roads made by the English were not in existence. In order to come to Chittur from the district towns, one had to travel by the marvellous roads laid down by the Mogul emperors. On his way from Potehin to the town, Mohendra had been travelling from south to north, and it was therefore that he met the soldiers on the way. The direction Bhavananda had to take from the Hill of Palms towards the inn, was also from south to north; necessarily, he too on his way fell in with the sepoys in charge of the treasure. Like Mohendra, he stood aside to let them pass. Now, for one thing, the soldiers naturally believed that the dacoits would be sure to attempt the plunder of this despatch of treasure, and on that apprehension came the arrest of a dacoit in the very highway. When they saw Bhavananda too standing aside in the nighttime, they inevitably concluded that here was another dacoit. Accordingly, they seized him on the spot.

Bhavananda smiled softly and said,

"Why so, my good fellow?"

"Rogue!" answered a sepoy, "you are a robber."

"You can very well see I am an ascetic wearing the yellow robe. Is this the appearance of a robber?"

"There are plenty of rascally ascetics and Samnyasins who rob," retorted the sepoy, and he began to push and drag Bhavananda. Bhavananda's eyes flashed in the darkness, but he only said very humbly, "Good master, let me know your commands."

The sepoy was pleased at Bhavananda's politeness and said, "Here, rascal, take this load and carry it," and he clapped a bundle on Bhavananda's head. Then another of the sepoys said to the first, "No, he will run away; tie up the rascal on the cart where the other rogue is bound." Bhavananda grew curious to know who was the man they had bound; he threw away the bundle on his head and administered a slap on the cheek to the soldier who had put it there. In consequence, the sepoys bound Bhavananda, lifted him on to the cart and hung him down near Mohendra. Bhavananda at once recognised Mohendra Singha.

The sepoys again marched on, carelessly and with noise, and the creaking of the cartwheels recommenced. Then, softly and in a voice audible only to Mohendra, Bhavananda said, "Mohendra Singha, I know you and am here to give you help. There is no need for you to know just at present who I am. Do very carefully what I tell you. Put the rope that ties your hands on the wheel of the cart."

Mohendra, though astonished, carried out Bhavananda's suggestion without a word. Moving a little towards the cartwheel under cover of darkness, he placed the rope that tied his hands so as to just touch the wheel. The rope was gradually cut through by the friction of the wheel. Then he cut the rope on his feet by the same means. As soon as he was free of his bonds, by Bhavananda's advice he lay inert on the cart. Bhavananda also severed his bonds by the same device. Both lay utterly still and motionless.

SEDITION PROSECUTION IN SUKKUR, SINDH.

We are in possession of the copies of papers (given under) filed at the criminal prosecution 124 A. I. P. C. against Gourdhandas, son of Topandas Sharma, Chetumal, Swadeshi Merchant, Sukkur and Mr. Virumal Begraj. The complainant is Mr. Manley, Assistant Superintendent of Police, appointed on special duty at Sukkur (presumably for the conduct of this case) and he has been directed by the District Superintendent of Police to file a complaint against the three mentioned above. The D. S. P. has received a sanction from the Government of Bombay to proceed against the accused with respect to the printing and publication of Swadeshi Halchal book purporting to have been translated by Gourdhandas published by Chetumal and printed by the Manager, Edware Press. The complaint contained a list of extracts from the book purporting to be seditious. Non-bailable warrants were issued against the three accused. Several search warrants against the press, the proprietor's house, Chetumal's shop, factory and house, at Sukkur, Mr. Udhalidas' factory and house, Tolaram Menghraj's house, Mr. Shewaram N. Pherwani's house, Master Bijaram, Relumal, Pandit Topandas house and Dharma Shikarpur and Gourdhandas' house at Karachi were searched by the D. S. P. and the Inspector and other Police officers and at Sukkur by the A. S. P., Police Inspector and other Police officers aided everywhere by Magistrates. Though warrants authorized the search of houses for obtaining and securing copies of "Swadeshi Halchal" all papers found were removed which in itself was a very questionable procedure. The sorting of papers at Sukkur is said to have been done in the Collectorate by Mr. Manley, A. S. P. and aided by several clerks and Munshies in the presence of Messrs. Shillidy, Jhamrai, Mohamed Yakub, Vazir, Police Inspector, Sukkur and others.

The case was fixed on the first, but it has been postponed by the court to Saturday, the 9th instant, at 1 a. m. The sub-Divisional Magistrate, Shikarpur, has ordered one copy of the book out of the seized to be given to each of the accused for his defence.

IN THE COURT OF THE SUB-DIVISIONAL MAGISTRATE, SHIKARPUR.

The undersigned hereby brings to the court's notice the following facts:—

That a book in the Sindhi-Arabic character entitled "Swadeshi Hal Challya Muhban Watan Shriyat Tilak Raja" has been printed and published in Sukkur.

5. That the persons responsible for its appearance and publication are:

(a) Gourdhandal Kelchand, its author, compiler or translator.

H. Bose's

H. BOSE, Mfg. Perfumer, DELKHOSH HOUSE, Bowbazar, Calcutta.

(b) Virumal Begraj, Manager of the Edward Printing Press, Sukkur, at which it was printed and from which it was published.

(c) Chetumal Hariram, Publisher, from whose shop copies of the book were sold.

3. That the said book contains matter, the writing, printing and publication of which is calculated to excite feelings of disaffection, hatred or contempt towards the Government, established by law in British India, and is punishable under section 124 A of the Indian Penal Code. Extracts are annexed, which illustrate the seditious tone of the book, which particularly insist on alien character of the Government and its indifference to the welfare of the people.

4. That the said Gordhanlal Kalchand, author, Virumal Begraj, printer, and Chetumal Hariram, publisher, are therefore all guilty of the offence of sedition as defined in section 124A Penal Code.

5. That this information is lodged by order of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay in Council (original order attached) and that the undersigned has been deputed by the District Superintendent of Police, Sukkur, to carry out the order.

Wherefore the undersigned prays that the court in the exercise of its powers under section 190 of the Cr. Pro. Code will take cognizance of the offence of sedition under 124 A. I. P. C. committed in a manner stated by the aforesaid Gordhanlal Kalchand, Virumal Begraj and Chetumal Hariram and deal with them according to law.

PANDIT BHOJ DUTT'S CASE ADJOURNED.

At the Calcutta Police Court not long ago, Pandit Bhoj Dutt Sharma obtained a rule from Mr. Swinhoe on the detective Superintendent at whose instance an order was issued restraining the Pandit from holding any meeting and taking any part in any meeting to show cause why the ex parte order passed against him should not be cancelled. The rule was fixed for hearing before Mr. Swinhoe on Friday. But, as the Pandit had missed the mail train at Agra, he could not be present in Court, and on Mr. Hume, who appeared to show cause, insisting that the matter might be heard and the witnesses should be examined in the Pandit's presence, the matter was adjourned.

A MAHARAJAH'S GIFT.

The Secretary of the Poona Branch of the Depressed Classes Mission writes to the Panjabee that H. H. the Maharajah Sahib, Gackwad has been pleased to give a donation of Rs. 1,000 to the Institution in Poona for the purposes of founding annual prize and scholarships in the name of His Highness. The Maharajah Sahib has also been pleased to order from Baroda five gold mohars with His Highness face, three of which are to be presented to the Chambhaa girl who garlanded and two to the Mahar girls who waved the "arti" to His Highness on the occasion of the prize distribution last Sunday. The mohars are to be preserved by the girls as souvenirs.

SERVANTS OF SARKAR.

An eye witness writes to the "Bengaloe." Sir,—Yesterday, just after the college hours when we were returning home, we caught sight of three or four constables huddling together near the crossing of Anherst Street and Mirzapore Street. When we came up to them, we saw they were mercilessly beating a poor cobbler. The Policemen paid no heed to our queries. They were so recklessly slapping the poor fellow that when we interfered, some of us even felt the roughness of their palms.

When the cobbler was let loose, we enquired what it was in him that so much annoyed the constables. The man sobbed "Babu, I did nothing I was mending shoes sitting on the footpath." We turned back to the Policemen to ask them why did they so cruelly beat that poor cobbler for an offence like that. They unhesitatingly replied "we are servants of the Sarkat (Government) and we are not to give account of what we have done to school Babus."

From the by-standers, we learnt that a constable ordered the man to leave the footpath which he would not do until his work in hand was finished. Is there any one to rectify such high-handedness of the Police?

His Highness the Raja of Nabha has become a patron of the Lahore Exhibition and has contributed Rs. 2,000 towards it. The Raja of Nabha and the Raja of Poonch have also both become patrons, their subscriptions amounting to Rs. 1,100 each.

The latest report from the Frontier about Dr Abdul Ghani, states that he is confined with some eighty other political offenders in a large State building at Sherpur.

The Amir is attempting to stop the constant raids and highway robberies which are taking place both on the Afghanistan border and in the country itself. The Afghan ruler's orders to certain tribes to furnish men for compulsory service appear to meet with a very unwilling response, and a good deal of friction in more than one quarter now exists. The Nungurahat country is unsettled and tribal feuds are being carried on in Kohistan and in the Kurram district.

GANESH BALWANT MODAK'S CASE.

On the 6th October Justice Chandra Varrier delivered judgment in the matter of Ganesh Balwant Modak who was sentenced to one month's simple imprisonment by Mr. Aston, Chief Presidency Magistrate, for disseminating seditious matter by the publication in Swaraj under section 124A. His Lordship held that after carefully reading the article on "Etymology of bomb in Bengal," he could come to no other conclusion than that its object and intention was to bring Government into hatred and contempt as contemplated by section 124A. Government, according to the writer, was composed of race which is maternal. It has proved people's oppressor. It is demoralising them by turning out scoundrel patriots. It is irritating them by repressive measures. It has exasperated them to acts of violence. It has secretly allowed "Mahomedan rowdies" to attack Hindus and all this has served to bring bomb into existence. The use of bomb is sanctioned by the writer as "lawful" and "not criminal" under state of things portrayed by him. Throughout, there is a attempt to create the impression that Government exists for satisfaction of its own cupidity. Even the peace of the country enjoyed under Government is referred to ironically. Such writings cannot but have been meant by the writer to bring Government into contempt and hatred and to excite feelings of disaffection against it. I agree with the learned Magistrate that article is seditious within the meaning of section 124A of the Penal Code. Accordingly the conviction and sentence must be confirmed.

MR. PRANJAPAY RELEASED FROM JAIL.

A panchayat gathering was held in honour of Mr. Pranajpay ex-editor of the Kal who was released from jail on Tuesday last at Girgaum yesterday when Mr. Pranajpay alluding to the Subarnati jail said, he thanked God for the honour done to him of being confined in a jail already sanctified by Mr. Tilak by his detention there.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The movement set on foot by the National council of education seems to have taken a strong hold of the public mind. This is quite evident from the success of the recent tour of Babus Harendra Nath Dutta and Monmohan Bhattacharjee in East Bengal. At the conference held at Mymensingh on the 27th Sept. the leaders of Mymensingh undertook to raise 20,000 rupees for the building fund of the Local National School within a few months, and rupees five thousand were subscribed on the spot. Babus Anath Bandhu Guha and Mohim Chandra Roy subscribing one thousand rupees each. The members of the School Committee headed by Babu Anath Bandhu Guha have also undertaken to raise 10, 100 rupees yearly for the maintenance of the school. Babu Anath Bandhu and Mahindra each subscribing 25 rupees monthly to this latter fund.

At Dacca also the plunders' bar and the Muktears bar headed by Babus Triloky Nath Bose, Rajanikant Gupta, Ananda Ch. Chakrabarti, Rasik Ch. Chakravarti, Surja Kumar Banerjee, Lalit Mohan Ray and others have undertaken to raise Rs. 5,000 for fitting the workshop and laboratory and Rs. 700 monthly for the maintenance of the Dacca National School. Narayanganj bar and Munshiganj bar each subscribing Rs. 50 monthly to that fund.

NEWS.

ENGLISH FABRICS IN CALCUTTA.

The Master of Elibank replying Mr. Rees said that the Government of India state that enquiries show that boycott was only a secondary factor in the congestion of stocks of English fabrics in Calcutta. The stocks were highest in January, 1908, and have since steadily declined. Deliveries are reported to be improving daily.

SUICIDE IN LONDON.

A curious story was told at the inquest on Benayendra Nath Sen, the Hindu law student, who jumped from the window of his lodgings at Ealing. From the evidence of his relatives, it appears, that he had proposed marrying a girl of sixteen living at Addison Gardens, Kensington. His father objected to it as he had failed to pass any of his examinations, and was not in a position to support a wife. He had suffered from insomnia for twelve nights and was worried over his failure at the examinations.

Dr. Sinha stated that the deceased went practically mad while in India, and had since suffered from melancholia and homicidal mania. While at Oxford University he developed a mania for buying things he did not want, in six months spent £2,000. He had then practically an unlimited supply of money from his father who was one of the ablest barristers in India.

HEALING BALM

And you need not buy it !!!
THE TWENTIETH CENTURY MAGIC.

WHY?

Because:—A SINGLE DOSE convinces its efficacy.

Because:—A DAYS USE gives a complete relief for all burning and inflammation of the passage.

Because:—A WEEK'S USE cures radically restoring the lost health.

Because:—GONOCOCCI the bacilli—the germs which are the root cause of this nasty disease are TOTALLY ERADICATED by Healing Balm.

Beware of the ruck ahead—and take care beforehand, lest life shall be a total wreck !!!

The insidious are the worst enemies, and a stitch in time saves nine.

HEALING BALM:—Can be used by patients of both sexes all places and seasons.

HEALING BALM:—Does a way with the necessity to Injections and Surgery which is sure to follow it.

HEALING BALM:—Is perfectly non-injurious and as such it does no injury to the kidneys or the alimentary canal.

1. One of the leading medical Journals the Indian Lancet says:—"We have no hesitation in saying that R. Laugin & Co.'s Healing Balm is a safe and reliable Therapeutic Agent and one on which medical men and the general public may, without any doubt, depend."

2. Dr. Edwin S. Pushong, M. D. P. S. (London), says:—"I have much pleasure in stating that Healing Balm certainly has a most striking effect on Urethral infections. No case will be found to resist its beneficial and specific effect."

3. Dr. T. U. Ahmed, M. B. C. M., L. S. A. (London), His Majesty's Vice-Consul, says:—"I can recommend this Healing Balm strongly to the suffering public."

A GREAT WORK ON HINDU RELIGION.

BHISMA;

HIS LIFE AND TEACHINGS.

1. The name of the MAHABHARATA has long been known widely all over the civilized world. This great Epic has not been translated into almost all civilized languages. Therefore the story of the Mahabharata is known to all; and the name of the great Patriarch of the Kurus Bhishma, is familiar to every one, whether the East or in the West.

2. His TEACHINGS to his nephews stand unexampled in world: they are the grandest on the various phases of human duties,—religious, social, political and moral, that were ever told to man, or that were ever found in any other literature. It occupies the whole of the SANTI PARVAN of the MAHABHARATA, the biggest, the most difficult, the greatest and the sublimest of all other Parvans.

3. But unfortunately the Mahabharata is not a handy work, but it is a stupendous mass of literature. Hardly there is one in these busy days, who has time or who cares to take the trouble to read this great work from page to page. Therefore the NOBLEST CHARACTER OF BHISMA is not widely known, or so greatly appreciated as it should be. His GREAT TEACHINGS—THE NOBLEST AND THE GRANDEST THAT WERE EVER DELIVERED,—lie hidden under the great mass of the great Mahabharata.

4. We have humbly ventured to undertake the publication of this work. It will be a handy volume and will be in simple and lucid language, so that every one will be able to read and understand it without the least difficulty. The book will be published in Monthly Parts and will be completed in Twelve such parts. Each Part will come out at the end of every month. PART FIRST SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH are out, fifth is in the press, and will shortly be out.

SUBSCRIPTION—Each Part per V. P. P. is one Rupee.

HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

Its exposition is in the best style. No Hindu household should be without a copy of this great and grand work. Every Hindu should know on what grand philosophical basis his great Religion stands.

(1) The Birth of the Hindu Philosophy. (2) The Philosophy of the Upanishads. (3) Sankhya Philosophy. (4) Yoga Philosophy. (5) Nyaya Philosophy. (6) Vaisheshika. (7) Mimamsa Philosophy. (8) Vedanta Philosophy. (9) Jaina Philosophy. (10) Buddhist Philosophy. (11) Charvaka and other Philosophies. (12) The Hindu Religion and the Hindu Philosophy.

The book is thus divided into twelve sections, dealing with the Hindu Philosophy in all its phases. Nothing has been left unsaid. The most difficult and abstruse Hindu Philosophy has been placed before the publication of this book, such no grasp even a boy will be able to import its mystery and understand its import. Price Rs. 2-8. Reduced Price 1-8. Postage Extra.

BRAHMACHYVA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

BY

SJ. ROMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVATTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOPHIST (conducted by Col.
H. S. OLSON, P. T. S.), Madras; "An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—
"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences.
The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORIAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon)—
"Brahmacharyya describes the life which Brahmachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture of students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUB-RAMANIAM IYER, K. C. L. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

INDIAN PRISONERS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

A curious incident reported by the Indian Opinion to hand reveals strange doings in South African jails with regard to Indian prisoners. One Samy Naidu prisoner in Pretoria Gaol had had the audacity to complain to the Governor regarding the food and the difficulty of obtaining a bath. As a result, on a particularly cold day the Chief Warder ordered the Indians to take a bath! On their hesitating, the Chief Warder, it is alleged touched Samy Naidu on the shoulder and said, "You are the man who complained to the Governor that you could not get a bath. I shall give you a good bath now." He then called six penal natives to take Naidu to the bath and while two held him, the others scrubbed him with hard yard brooms, until he was scratched and bleeding all over! Another Indian was given a similar bath, but in his case the scrubbing was not so thorough. The Indian residents in Pretoria and some God fearing white men (of whom happily there is no absolute dearth even in the Transvaal) made such a row over the matter that an official enquiry followed and the alleged offenders were "warned and exonerated." An Indian prisoner, we further learn, was sent to solitary confinement for twelve days and another for seven because they had complained about their food! It is easy to see, says the Indian Opinion, why a man like Nagappan should have suffered in silence even unto death! India surely is getting a conspicuous place in "the Empire." Mrs. Annie Besant to note.

BUDDHA'S RELICS.

Two meetings of the Sanatan Dharma Prabardhini Sabha, Calcutta, were held on the 27th September and 3rd October, 1909, to consider the question of Buddha's relics.

Both the meetings were held under the presidency of Rai Debi Prasad, B.A., B.L., and the gathering was overcrowded by pandits and educated Hindus. In both the meetings the question of Buddha's relics was discussed fully with impressive speech, and in the last meeting Thakur Mahabir Singh, the Secretary, put forward the resolution that the Buddha's relics should be retained in India, and it was seconded and supported by Pandit Deoki Nandan Shastri and Babu Sidheswara Banerji respectively and unanimously carried. The following telegram was sent to the Viceroy, from the president, the next day:—

"Sanatan Dharma Prabardhini Sabha, Calcutta, in public meeting attended by Pandits and educated Hindus, respectfully and earnestly prays that Lord Buddha's relics be retained in India, their going out and division would cause extreme grief and dissatisfaction. Buddha was among Vishnu's ten great Avatars."

PHILOSOPHY AND MADNESS IN RELIGION.

There are two things in religion which frighten many people. They are Rationalism on the one hand and Mysticism on the other. And yet I think both are essential in religion. Keshub Chander Sen spoke of Philosophy and Madness in Religion in 1877 and in his own masterly way dwelt upon the two elements of our religious life. I call them elements purposely. For I am persuaded that Rationalism goes hand in hand with Mysticism. I do not agree with religious people who would deny rationalism and the rationalist a place in religion and I refuse to identify mysticism with all religion. We are all of us and each of us partly Rational and partly Mystic. We are all of us and each of us more of a rationalist at one time and more of a mystic at other times.

Rationalism means faith in knowledge that is distinct and clear. Mysticism means faith and loyalty to a vision: to an ideal. Our knowledge of anything is never clear and distinct and complete from the outset. But our knowledge grows. Our perception once hazy becomes clear and distinct by degrees. The vision grows: it comes nearer and nearer, and the mystic form assumes a clear and distinct shape. And this happens at every stage. As soon as one vision has become rational, a second vision appears on the mental horizon, and thus from the mystic we grow into the rationalist and from the rationalist into the mystic again. The cycle goes on and there is no end to it.

Now just suppose that you and I both are materialists and rationalists and you begin to see a little beyond our common materialism. You begin to realize that behind matter there is such a thing as energy and this revelation to you changes your whole attitude to the universe: alters your way of thinking about this world. You try to reason and explain your new knowledge to me but you hardly convince me. For I have not seen the vision and your own knowledge of it is not clear or distinct. The result is I call you mad, or if for any reason I wish to be kind to you, I change the title into a "mystic." All the same I keep on believing that there is something wrong in your understanding, till I also begin to be convinced of the existence of Energy - of an Infinite Energy from which all things proceed. In this way stage after stage we go on—if we do go on and not let ourselves rest satisfied with our knowledge at any one step—we go on turning mystic and rationalist to ourselves and to each other.

The Vitalist is a mystic to the materialist. The Idealist is a mystic to the Vitalist. The theist is a mystic to the deist. The monist is a mystic to the dualist. Thus at every stage of our spiritual and metaphysical life, philosophy alternates with madness, rationalism with mysticism. And according to this view of rationalism, the scientific materialist and agnostic is as much rationalistic as the Berkeleyan Idealist or the Hegelian monist. Rationalism should not, because it cannot, be the monopoly of the materialist or the agnostic although these are the commonest forms of Rationalism.

But we must not lose sight of one form of mysticism which never seems to have been resolved into rationalism. There is one stage of madness in religion which cannot be reduced to philosophy. We may fitly call it transcendental mysticism. Let me proceed to indicate its nature, for it is a thing that cannot be described as we shall presently see.

All our knowledge of things and ideas are conditioned by Time, Space and Causality (Desh, Kala, Karana). But there is a knowledge of certain "things" which are beyond such conditions of Time, Space and Causality. And we can not describe them to each other, for in human language every noun implies space, every verb implies time and every proposition or judgement implies causality. How can we describe these transcendental experiences in human language? Are there really such experiences? Yes they are as real as any thing we know of: perhaps more real than any thing we know of. Carlyle called them: Eternal verities. We shall take only two of them. Love and Righteousness to illustrate our meaning.

Love is beyond Time and Space and Causality. If I love to-day and hate to-morrow I do not love at all. If I love in India and hate in England I do not love at all. If I love and my love is prompted by any circumstances whatsoever, my love turns out to be mere interest. And similarly with righteousness dharma. If I am righteous to-day and unrighteous to-morrow I am not righteous at all. If I am righteous in England and unrighteous in India I am not righteous at all. If my righteousness is prompted by any consideration whatsoever, it is no longer righteousness but policy: it is no longer dharma but artha:

Thus love and righteousness are beyond all why and wherefore. The lovers and the righteous are always mystics. And who amongst us is utterly destitute of love or absolutely free from experiences of righteousness? Who therefore has not been a mystic at times amongst us? The difference between us and the transcendental mystic is a difference of growth. He is always in love and always practising righteousness. He has also advanced far into regions where time and space and causality disappear. In him the spiritual has absorbed the material and the mental.

For I believe that spirit exists untrammelled by space and time. Spirit conditioned by time—the timeless manifested by the maya of time constitutes Mind. And Spirit conditioned by both time and space, seen through the dark glassness of time and space, manifested by the two-fold maya is what we call matter. He who has realised the spirit and is living in the spirit is the Transcendental Mystic. God is a spirit and they that worship Him worship the Spirit and in reality!

"STUDENTS AND POLITICS"

MR. GOKHALE'S SPEECH.

At the annual gathering of the Student's Brotherhood, the Hon'ble Mr. G. K. Gokhale delivered the following address on students and politics. I am deeply sensible of the high honour which the Committee of Student's Brotherhood have done me in asking me to take the chair on the occasion I have been following with close interest and sincere appreciation has admirable work which the Brotherhood has been doing since it was founded twenty years ago by our friend, Prof. Velinkar. There is always a great scope for institutions like this Brotherhood and never was the need for them greater than to-day when our student community is a bitterly passing through very difficult times. One of the most anxious, as it is one of the most important problems confronting us to-day is how to supply guidance, wise and patriotic to our young men so that their lives may be directed into channels of high purpose and endeavour in the service of the motherland. To sustain on one hand, those pure impulses and generous enthusiasms which are the special privilege of youth, and on the other, to instil into young minds a due sense of proportion and of responsibility and a correct realization of the needs of the country. This can never be an easy task, and in the present situation of India it is beset with extraordinary difficulties. Influences are at work around us which bid everyone "not to sit nor to stand, but to go." The very air we breathe is laden with a longing for change. Our beliefs are crumbling, new adjustments of ideas have become necessary, and amidst this general commotion which has been very properly called unrest; it was not to be expected that our students alone should continue to stand where they did. It is not the fact of their movement so much as the direction, in which a large proportion of them have been moving, that calls for our most earnest attention and our closest inquiry. It is a well known truism that the students of to-day will be the citizens of tomorrow. Ideas and aspirations which given decisive bent to their minds, are, therefore matters of the deepest moment to the country and it behoves us all seriously to examine how far they are calculated to prepare them for the responsibilities, which must in due course descend to them. One complaint, which is often heard, may be dismissed at once. It is said in disparagement of the Indian student that he begins to feel an interest in politics long before his time and that it is necessary to put an end to this state of things. Now, the fact itself of such precocious interest may be admitted at once, but those who speak of it as an evil that must, or can be put down, fail obviously to realize that it is an inevitable result of the exceptional political situation of the country and that it is bound to last as long that situation continues in all essentials unaltered. Among the self-governing people politics brings into play not only the sentiment of patriotism, but also the sense of responsibility. And young men who feel the sentiment but lack the sense of responsibility, naturally leave practical affairs to their elders who possess both. To the Indian student on the other hand, Indian politics is only a struggle, in which his countrymen are engaged on behalf of their motherland with a body of foreign officials, representing the rule of another nation. There is no room here even for the elders for any feeling of responsibility with regard to the administration of the country and for our young men who find no restraining consideration in their patch politics, necessarily resolves its life in to a mere matter of patriotic sentiment. An interest in politics is to the Indian student the same thing as an interest in the country. And to such interest, all that is earnest, all that is self-respecting all that is chivalrous, all that is patriotic in his nature, is continually impelling him. England herself has introduced into the country ideas, which preach to us the dignity and high worth of patriotism of freedom of self-government and which tell us of the contempt which in the eyes of all self-governing people covers those who accept their subjection in a slavish spirit. Our politics to-day is, for the most part a spread of those ideas among the people and an attempt to apply them to our present condition. And it is inevitable that the most impressionable minds in the country should be the most affected by them. Responsibility alone will steady our judgments, and control the restlessness of our patriotism. Where responsibility has been conferred on the people, as in Municipal matters, students feel no interest before their time. As we cease to fill the role of mere critics at the admitted to a participation in the responsibilities of Government, our politics will advance from the sentimental to the responsible stage, and the precious interest, at present felt in it by our young men, will tend to disappear. But because it is impossible to prevent Indian students from taking an interest in politics before their time, therefore it does not follow, that they should be left to pick up their political ideas, where and how they can. On the contrary, I strongly hold, that a crying need of the present situation is the provision in Colleges, of facilities for the efficient training sense of our young men. The present policy of treating politics, and specially current politics, as dangerous, and in some respects, even a forbidden subject has only resulted in depriving students of that guidance to which they are entitled at the hands of their teachers. In forming sound views on important questions. To leave them thus to their own devices, amidst the perplexities of a difficult situation, is to neglect a plain duty towards them at a critical period in their lives, and the consequences of this neglect have been and are bound to be, serious, and far reaching. I was glad to see this view urged, the other day, in a letter to the press, by the Rev. Mr. Andrews of Delhi, than whom there is no better friend of Indian students and Indian aspirations in the country. "The historical and economic questions," says Mr. Andrews "which lie at the base of at least three-fourths of the politics of modern India should be dealt with wisely and sympathetically by those, who are teaching history and economics, and sound opinion thus be built up within the colleges themselves. Different teachings will no doubt take different views of the same questions, but it is not so much the views urged on the attention of the students as to the proper cultivation of their political sense, and the habit of careful and comprehensive thinking in regard to political problems, that must be the chief object sought, and will constitute the real gain. The very fact that our students can not help taking an interest in politics before their time, goes to emphasize the great need that exists for their efficient political education. I think, our students, especially college students, should enjoy every possible facility for acquiring an accurate knowledge of political matters, and forming sound views in regard to them. They should be encouraged to discuss such matters freely in the college; and publicists whose opinions are entitled to weight, should, from time to time, be invited to take part in the discussions. They should be at liberty to attend public lectures and addresses on political subjects, and they may even attend political meetings with advantage provided, they are there only as spectators. But when it comes to active participation in what is called political agitation, I think we must draw a line. Political agitation, directed towards the people, seeks to educate and organize public feeling and public opinion in political matters. Directed towards the Government it seeks to bring the pressure of that feeling or opinion to bear upon the authorities for the purpose of securing the changes that are desired. In either case it is most irresponsible action, and students, with their immature judgments are not qualified to take part in it. The active participation of students in political agitation really tends to lower the dignity and the responsible character of public life, and impair its true effectiveness. It also fills the students themselves with unhealthy excitement after evoking in them a bitter partisan spirit, which cannot fail to interfere with their intellectual and moral growth. The period of four or five years which most young men spend at college is all too short a time for the work which properly belongs to it, namely, preparation in knowledge and character for the responsibilities of life. Surely it is not too much to ask our students to exercise a little patience and self-restraint during this period and defer responsible action in politics till after they have completed their studies, and taken their place in the public life of the country. I venture to think, that a stage has been reached in our affairs, when it is necessary for us to face resolutely our responsibilities in this matter. Every one knows that during the last few years a new school of political thought has risen in the country and that it has exercised a powerful fascination over the minds of young men, more or less, in all parts of India. A considerable part of what it has preached could not but find ready acceptance on every hand. That love of country should be the ruling principle of our lives that we should rejoice in making sacrifices for her sake, that we should rely wherever we could, on our own exertions, — these propositions are not preached for the first time in the country, but they were urged by the new party from a hundred platforms and in a hundred organs of public opinion, with a passion which roused general enthusiasm. Evidently with this indomitable, valuable work, the new party gave to the country a goal, but a goal which could only be regarded as immaterial political teaching. That teaching was in the main, an insistence directed to the destruction of the very foundations of the old public life in the country, but once started, it could not be confined to that object, and in course of time it came to be applied generally. Its chief aim lay in its pointing out historical considerations, and tracing our principal troubles to the existence of foreign government in the country. Our old public life was based on truth and loyalty to British rule, due to recognition of the fact, that, that rule alone could ensure to the country the peace and order which were necessary for slowly evolving a nation out of the heterogeneous elements of which it was composed and for ensuring that a steady advance in different directions. The new teaching condemned all truth in the British Government as childish, and all hope of any real progress under it as vain. Politicking and a respectful representation on a grievance to authorities which in England was asserted as a right of the people after a long struggle, was denounced as mere mendacity. Boycott was to be the new weapon, and its universal adoption was to bring us the realisation of all our dreams. The teaching made for a time, rapid progress. It was new, it was plain, it was attractive and it promised a short cut to self Government. Time the British Government rethinks, but it was to be ignored and it was expected that it would in its turn ignore those who ignored it. The spread of this teaching was greatly helped by the general gloom that had settled over the mind of the people during the closing years of Lord Curzon's administration. It was also helped by the apparent failure of the National Congress to secure constitutional reforms in the administration of the country in spite of many years' agitation. Our general lack of political judgment was also responsible for the large measure of acceptance which it received. Not many of us care to think for ourselves in political matters, or, for the matter of truth, in any other matters. Ready-made opinions are as convenient as ready-made clothes and so popular. The bulk of the recruits of the new school came from the ranks of our students and though many of the elderly adherents of that school have, by now been, more or less, disillusioned about the practicability of their programme, I fear its hold over its student followers is still as strong as before. It is for this reason that I have deemed it my duty to refer to the subject as we today. I think those of our public men who realise the harm which the new teaching had done, have not so far done their duty to the student community of the country. Their inaction had no doubt been due to motives of delicacy but the result has just as deplorable as though the duty had been deliberately shirked. I feel it is now incumbent on us to speak out freely no matter how our conduct may be understood. We owe this to our country, we owe this to the young men themselves. As I have already said, the self reliance part of the new programme cannot but be a good thing. It is in regard to the other part, the Government, which the programme advocates, that the need for a new and a winning cause. As a student of Bhupendra Nath Bose pointed out the other day in Calcutta, the Government are the Government, and the Government are the Government. It is not certain that the Government are on the side of the student.

PARTICIPATION OF STUDENTS AND SCHOOL BOYS IN POLITICAL AGITATION

POLITICAL DEPARTMENT POLITICAL

Dated Calcutta, the 7th October 1909.
The Hon. Secy, to the Government of Bengal, No. 188 P, dated the 24th July 1909, which was published a few days before the celebration of the anniversary of the Boycott His Honour the Lieutenant Governor invited the participation of the Heads of Colleges and Schools and of all parents and guardians to the responsibility of permitting student and school boys to take part in such demonstrations. His Honour expressed the opinion that it was most undesirable that immature minds should be subjected to the excitement and distraction which are inseparable from political agitation, and he appealed to all who are responsible for the education of our young students and school boys to use their influence to induce them to abstain from taking part in, or from being present at, any form of political demonstration.

Sir Edward Barker desired to acknowledge the response which was made to this expression of his view, for the anniversary celebration of the Boycott was attended by a smaller number of students than on previous occasions. It is now again announced that political meetings will be held in connection with the anniversary of the Partition of Bengal, and His Honour desires again to invoke the attention of all responsible persons to the subject and trusts that on this occasion also they will similarly use their influence with the students and school boys in whom they are interested. His Honour ventures to hope that further reflection during the interval since the previous resolution was published may have produced a still more general and complete agreement with his views, and that students will be even less evasive at the forthcoming political meetings.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Mahomedan Representation.

The question of separate representation for the Mahomedan community is one of those momentous issues raised in haste by a statesman unable to appreciate the forces with which he is dealing, which bear fruit no man expected and least of all the ill-advised Frankenstein who was first responsible for its creation. The common belief among Hindus is that the Government have decided to depress the Hindu element in the Indian people by raising the Mahomedan element, and ensure a perpetual preponderance in their own favour by leaning on a Mahomedan vote purchased by a system of preference. The denials of highplaced officials, who declare that it is only out of a careful consideration for the rights and interests of minorities that they have made special Mahomedan representation an essential feature of the Reform Scheme, have not convinced a single Hindu mind; for the obvious retort is that it is only one minority which is specially cared for and this special care is extended to it even in provinces where it is in a large majority. No provision at all has been made for the safeguarding of Hindu minorities, for the Parsis, the Sikhs, the Christians and other sections which may reasonably declare that they too are Indians and citizens of the Empire no less than the Mahomedans. The workings of this belief in the mind of the premier community in India cannot at present be gauged. It is not till the details of the Reform scheme are published, the elections over, the councils working and the preponderance of the pro-government vote visible, that those workings can assume a definite shape. At present irritation, heart-burning, a sullen gloom and a growing resolve to assert and organize their separate existence and work for their own hand are the first results of the separatist policy. How far Sir Pherozshah and his valiant band will be able to fight this growing discontent, remains to be seen. It is quite possible that the pro-Mahomedanism of the Reform Scheme may lead to a Hindu upheaval all over India, as fervent and momentous as the convulsion in Bengal, Madras and Maharashtra which followed Lord Curzon's Partition blunder. How far it will advantage the Mahomedans to be in active opposition to an irritated and revolted Hindu community throughout the country they live in, is a question for Mahomedans to consider. A certain section with Syed Hyder Reza at their head, have considered it and are against the separate representation altogether. Another section represented by Mr. Ali Imam are for a compromise between the full Moslem demand for separate electorates and the Hindu demand for equal treatment of all communities. Unfortunately this compromise is merely the Government scheme which Hindu sentiment has almost unanimously condemned as unfair and partial. The only section of Hindus in its favour is the dwindling minority which follows the great Twin Brethren of Bombay and the support given by Mr. Cokhale and Sir Pherozshah to the separate representation idea is likely to ease them their influence with the moderate Hindu community everywhere outside the narrow radius of their personal influence. A third section rejoicing in the leadership of Mr. Amin Ali, are the incorrigibles of militant Islam aspiring to hold India under the British yoke as heirs of the Mogul and keepers of the gateway of India. The Reform Scheme is the second act of insanity which has germinated from the unsound policy of the bureaucracy. It will cast all India into the melting pot and complete the work of the Partition. Our own attitude is clear. We will have no part or lot in reforms which give no popular majority, no substantive control, no opportunity for Indian capacity and statesmanship, no seed of democratic expansion. We will not for a moment accept separate electorates or equitate representation, not because we are opposed to a large Mahomedan influence in popular assemblies when they come but, because we will be no party to a distinction which recognizes Hindu and Mahomedan as permanently separate political units and thus precludes the growth of a single and indivisible Indian nation. We oppose any such attempt at division whether it comes from an embarrassed Government seeking for political support or from an embittered Hindu community allowing the passions of the moment to obscure their vision of the future.

The Growth of Turkey.

The article on young Turkey and its military strength, extracted in our columns this week from the Indian Daily News, is one of great interest. Behind the depreciation of Turkish Chauvinism and Militarism we hear the first note of European alarm at the rise of a second Asiatic Power able to strike as well as to defend its honour and integrity against European aggression. The fact that it is the army in Turkey which stands for free institutions, is the greatest guarantee that could be given of the permanence of the new Turkey, for it assures a time of internal quiet while the country goes through the delicate and dangerous process of readjusting its whole machinery and ways of public thought and action from the habits of an irresponsible autocratic administration to those which suit free institutions and democratic ideas. No doubt, the support of the army veils a Dictatorship. But that is an inevitable stage in a great and sudden transition of this kind, and suits Asiatic countries, however perilous it may have been in other times to European countries when men could not be trusted not to misuse power for their own purposes to the detriment of their country. In Europe the present high standard of public spirit, duty, and honour was the slow creation of free institutions. To Asiatics, not yet corrupted, as many of us in India have been, by the worse part of European individualism and an unnatural education divorced from morality and patriotism, a high standard of public spirit, duty and honour comes with the first awakenings of a freer life; for the Asiatic discipline has always been largely one of self-effacement, the subordination of the individual to a community and the scrupulous adhesion to principle at the cost of personal predilection and happiness. As in Turkey now, so in Japan, it was a few strong men who, winning control of the country by the strength of great ideas backed by the sword, right supported by might, held the land safe and quiet while they revolutionised the ideas and institutions of the whole nation, forged a strength by sea and land no enemy could despise and secured from the gratitude of their race for their wisdom, selflessness and high nobility of purpose that implicit following which at first they compelled by force. The complaint that the young Turks ignore the necessity of civil reorganisation, commerce and education is a complaint without wisdom, if not without knowledge. The circumstances of Turkey demand that the first attention of her statesmen should be given to military and naval efficiency. The Revolution plucked her from the verge of an abyss of disintegration. The desperate diplomacy and cunning of Sultan Abdul Hamid had stayed her long on that verge, but she was beginning to slip slowly over when the stronger hand of Mahmud Shevket Pasha seized her and drew her back. Even so, the deposition of the cunning and skilful diplomatist of Yildiz Palace might have been the signal for a general spoliation of Turkey. Austria began a rush for the Balkans, Greece tried to hurry a crisis in Crete. The shaking of the Turkish sword in the face of the Greek and the rapid and efficient reorganisation of army and navy against Europe were both vitally necessary to the safety of the Empire. They were the calculated steps not of Chauvinism but of a defensive statesmanship.

China Enters.

The circle of constitutionally governed Asiatic countries increases. To Turkey, Persia and Japan, China is added. Towards the close of the ten years set apart in the Chinese programme for the preparation of self-government, the Chinese Government has kept its promise to grant a constitution. Provincial Assemblies have been established, are working and have shown their reality and independence by opposing Government demands. The electoral basis of an Imperial Assembly has been provided. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the steady, resolute, methodical Chinese, with their unrivalled genius for organisation, will make a success of the constitutional experiment. In all Asia now, with the exception of Siam and Afghanistan, the only countries which are denied a constitutional Government are those which have not vindicated their national freedom. Even in Afghanistan the first ineffective stirrings of life have been seen and will grow to something formidable before many years are over. We wonder whether Lord Morley and his advisers really believe that when they are surrounded by a free and democratic Asia, the great Indian race can be kept in a state of tutelage and snail-paced advancement, much less put off to a future age in the dim mists of a millennial futurity to which the penetrating vision of the noble and Radical Lord cannot pierce? The worst opponents of Indian freedom know well what this Asiatic constitutionalism means, and therefore the Englishman struggles in the face of continual disappointment, to foresee the speedy collapse of Nationalism and Parliamentary Government in Persia, Turkey and even Japan as the inevitable fate of an institution foreign to the Asiatic genius, which is popularly supposed to recoil from freedom and hug most lovingly the heaviest chains.

The Patiala Arrests.

For some time past the Native states of Rajputana and Punjab have been vying with each other in promulgations and legislations of a drastic character against sedition and conspiracy. The object of these edicts seems to be to stifle all agitation or semblance of any political thought and activity that may be directed against the existing state of things not in the States themselves but in British India. Otherwise it is impossible to account for the Draconian severity of the language and substance of these ukases or the foolish thoroughness of some of the measures adopted, such as the prohibition of entry even to colourless papers like the Bengalee. The exponents of Anglo Indian opinion point triumphantly to these measures both as a proof of aristocratic loyalty to British officialdom and as an index of the severity with which the agitation would be visited if, instead of the misplaced leniency of British bureaucrats, we were exposed to the ruthlessness of an indigenous government. As every Indian knows, these self-gratulations are insincere and meaningless. The majority of Native States are wholly under the thumb of the Resident and, with the exception of one or two independent princes, like the Gakwar, neither Maharaja nor Council of Administration can call their souls their own. On all this comes the commotion in Patiala. The Patiala conspiracy has yet to be proved to be more real than the Midnapur specimen. But, if all is true that is being asserted in the Panjab press as to the refusal of the most ordinary privileges of defence to the numerous accused and the amazing and successful defiance of High Court orders by Mr. Warburton, the police are not going the best way to convince the public opinion on this point. The facts stated amount to a gross and shameless denial of justice. We do not blame the young Maharaja for his inability to interfere in favour of the oppressed victims of police rule. We know how helpless the princes are in the face of an Anglo Indian Resident or employee and we wholly discredit the newspaper assertion that these strange proceedings were initiated or are willingly countenanced by him. It was first asserted that—as usual!—the police had full evidence and information in their hands. The present delay and sufferings entailed prove sufficiently that they had nothing of the kind—again, as usual. The arrested Arya Samajists may be innocent or guilty, but the procedure used against them would be tolerated in no country where law and equity were supreme.

The Daulatpur Dacoity.

The extraordinary story from Daulatpur of a dacoity by young men of good family, sons of Government servants, is the strangest that has yet been handled by the detective ability of a very active police—more active, if not successful, we are afraid, in cases of this kind than those in which the dacoits are of a less interesting character. The details as first published read more like a somewhat gruesome comic opera, than anything else. Dacoits who wear gold watches and gold spectacles on their hazardous expeditions, dacoits who talk English so as to give a clue to their identity, dacoits who turn up at a railway station wearing gold watches, bare-footed and stained with mud, dacoits who carry in their pockets, bloodcurdling oaths neatly written out for the police to read in case they are caught, are creatures of so novel and eccentric a character that they must have either come out of a farcical opera or escaped from the nearest lunatic asylum. The later accounts modify some of the more startling features of the first, but until the story for the prosecution is laid before the Courts, thoroughly known and thoroughly tested, sensational headlines and graphic details are apt to mislead.

Place and Patriotism.

The elevation of Mr. Krishnaswamy Aiyar to the Bench some short time ago was the occasion for some comments from the Moderate Press highly eulogistic of the man and the choice. Mr. Aiyar was a successful lawyer and a capable man and we have no doubt his elevation was justified. But the curious habit of ultra-Moderate politicians gravitating to the Bench is a survival of those idyllic times when a judgeship or a seat in the Legislative Council was the natural goal of the political leader who rose by opposing the Government. This harmony between place and patriotism, opposition and preferment was natural to those times for whose return the lovers of the peaceful past sigh in vain. Mr. Krishnaswamy Aiyar belonged to the old school and his final consummation is natural and laudable. But our object in writing is not so much to praise Mr. Aiyar as to suggest to the Government that, if they would similarly promote Sir Pherozshah Mehta, they would be rewarding a loyal champion and at the same time conferring a boon on the country. Farther, if only done in time, it might save the Convention from going to pieces.

The Dying Race.

Dr. U. N. Mukherji recently published a very interesting brochure in which he tried to prove that the Hindus were a dying race and would do well to imitate the social freedom and equality of the still increasing Mahomedans. Sriji Lal Sircar has gone one better and proves to us by equally cogent statistics that not only the Hindus but the Mahomedans are a dying race,—even if the Hindus be in some places a little more rapid in the race for extinction than the followers of Islam. With all respect to the earnestness of these two gentlemen we think it would have been well if they had been less strenuous in their discouraging interpretations and chosen a less positive title. The real truth is that, owing to an immense transition being effected under peculiarly unfavourable conditions, both communities, but chiefly the more progressive Hindu, are in a critical stage in which various deep-seated maladies have come to the surface, with effects of an inevitable though lamentable character. None of these maladies is mortal and the race is not dying. But the knife of the surgeon is needed and it is to the remedy rather than the diagnosis that attention should be pointedly directed. The mere decline in the rate of increase is in itself nothing. It is a phenomenon which one now sees becoming more and more marked all the world over and it is only countries backward in development and education which keep up the old rate of increase. The unfit tend to multiply, the fit to be limited in propagation. This is an abnormal state of things which indicates something wrong in modern civilisation. But, whatever the malady is, it is not peculiar to Hindus or to India, but a world-wide disease.

The Death of Senor Ferrer.

The extraordinary commotion in Europe over the execution of the enthusiast and idealist Ferrer, a judicial murder committed by Court Martial,—has revealed a force in Europe with which statesmen and Governments will have very soon to deal on pain of extinction. We have no sympathy with the philosophy or practice of Anarchism, holding, as we do, that the Anarchist philosophy is some millenniums ahead of the present possible evolution of humanity and the Anarchist practice some millenniums behind. But Senor Francisco Ferrer was no mere Anarchist. He was a man of high enthusiasms and ideas, engaged, at great sacrifice and, as it turns out, risk to himself, in freeing the Spanish mind by education from the fetters of that bigoted Clericalism which has been the ruin of Spain. For a man of this kind—a man of eminent culture and unstained character, the friend and fellow worker of distinguished men all over the occidental world,—to be shot without any reputable evidence by a military tribunal regardless of universal protest, was an outrage on civilisation and an insult to European culture. Such an incident, however, might have happened formerly with no result but a few indignant articles in the Continental Liberal Press. This time it has awakened a demonstration all over the Western world which is, we think, unprecedented in history. The solidarity and deep feeling in that demonstration means that the huge inert Leviathan, on whose patient back the aristocratic and middle class of Europe have built the structure of their polity and society, is about to move. When he really uplifts his giant bulk, what will become of the structure? Will it not tumble into pieces off his back and be swallowed up in the waters of a worldwide revolution?

The Budget.

It is curious that England which was, a little while ago, the most conservative and individualistic of nations, the least forward in the race towards socialism, should now be the foremost. The socialistic Radical, the fore-runner of insurgent Leviathan, is in the Cabinet and has framed a Budget. The Budget is the pivot on which English progress has turned from the beginning. The power of the purse in the hands of the Commons has been the chief lever for the gradual erection of a limited democracy. The same power is now being used for the gradual introduction of a modified socialism, and, by a curious provision of Fate, seems destined to be also the occasion for the final destruction of one at least of the two remaining restrictions on democracy, the veto of the Lords and the limitation of the suffrage. The Lords were bound to oppose the Budget, for the triumph of socialism means the destruction of the aristocracy. The Lords, therefore, have either to fight or to fall; and the pathos of their situation is that, in all probability, the choice is not theirs and that, whether they fight or not, they cannot but fall. The Lords have only continued to exist because they were discreet enough to lie low and give a minimum of trouble. As for the limitation of the suffrage, it is not at all unlikely that the daring and unscrupulous campaign of the suffragettes may end in the concession of universal suffrage. For, if women are given the vote, the proletariat will not be content to remain without it. They too can lift crowbars and hammers and break glass roofs!

A Great opportunity.

The end of the great struggle between the last representative of European autocracy and the insurgent Demos, is not yet. At present the Czar holds the winning cards. The mismanagement of the Revolution by a people unaccustomed to political action has put advantages into his hands to which he has no right. But it is significant that the revolution still smoulders. As Carlyle wrote of the French Revolution, it is unquenchable and cannot be stamped down, for the fire-spouts that burst out are no slight surface conflagration but the flame's of the pit of Tophet. Murder and hatred rising from below to strike at murder and tyranny striking from above, that is the Russian Revolution. Had another man than a Romanoff, the race obstinate and unteachable, sat on the throne at St. Petersburg, the victory of the autocracy after such imminent and deadly peril would have been surely used to prevent, by healing measures and perfectly spontaneous concessions, a repetition of the sanguinary struggle. It is probably the last opportunity Fate will concede to the Czar Nicholas and it is a great opportunity. But he will not take it and in the shadow forces are again gathering which are likely in the end to destroy him. The Czarina is sleepless in deadly anxiety for the safety of her child the Czar leaving her behind, enters Italy and is guarded by an army. In Russia the Ministry balances itself on the top of a frail edifice crowning the volcano that still sputters below. One wonders why they should think it worth their while to bolster up sanguinary injustice for a season at so huge a cost.

Buddha's Ashes.

Again the powers that be have committed a blunder. If any of the wise men who weave the tangled web of Anglo-Indian statesmanship at Simla, had a little common sense to salt their superior wisdom, they would never, have allowed the strong feeling against the reclamation of Buddha's ashes to vent itself so long in public expression without an assurance, at least of favourable consideration. We have waited long for that simple and natural act of statesmanship, but in vain. It is such a trivial matter in itself, concession would be so graceful, natural and easy; yet the harm done by perverseness and churlishness is so immense! We wonder whether our official Governors ever think. It is very easy. What would they feel if the bones of a great Englishman, say, the Duke of Wellington, were so treated! But the diseased attachment to prestige and the reputation of an assured wisdom and an inflexible power have sealed up the eyes of those in high places.

Students and Politics.

All India and especially Bengal owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Hassan Imam for his strong, manly and sensible remarks on the vexed question of students and politics as President of the Beharee Students Conference at Gaya. Contrast this honest utterance and robust recognition of unalterable facts with the fencings, refinements and unreal distinctions of Mr. Gokhale's utterance. The difference is between a man with an eye and a clear practical sense and a mere intellectual, a man of books and words and borrowed thoughts, proud of his gift of speech and subtlety of logic, but unable to penetrate a fact even when he sees it. With Mr. Hassan Imam a strong personal force enters the field of politics.

THE ASSASSINATION OF PRINCE ITO.

A great man has fallen, perhaps the greatest force in the field of political action that the nineteenth century produced, the maker of Japan, the conqueror of Russia, the mighty one who first asserted Asia's superiority over Europe in Europe's own field of glory and changed in a few years the world's future. Some would say that such a death for such a man was a tragedy. We hold otherwise. Even such a death should such a man have died, in harness, fighting for his country's expansion and greatness, by the swift death in action, which, our scriptures tell us, carry the hero's soul straight to the felicity of heaven. The man who in his youth lived in imminent deadly peril from the swords of his countrymen because he dared to move forward by new paths to his God-given task, dies in his old age by a foreign hand because, at the expense of justice and a nation's freedom, he still moved forward in the path of his duty. It is a difficult choice that is given to men of action in a world where love, strength and justice are not yet harmonised, and he who chooses in sincerity and acts thoroughly, whether he has chosen well or ill, gathers punya for himself in this world and the next. Then he was building a nation and he lived to do his work, for his death would not have profited. He was building an Empire when he died and by his death that empire will be established. The soul of a great man, fulfilled in development but cut off in the midst of his work, enters into his following or his nation and works on a far wider scale than was possible to him in the body. Korea will gain nothing by this rash and untimely act, the greatest error in tactics it could have committed. The Japanese is the last man on earth to be deterred from his ambition or his duty by the fear of death, and the only result of this blow will be to harden Japan to her task. She has science, organisation, efficiency, ruthlessness, and she will grind the soul out of Korea until it is indistinguishable from Japan. That is the only way to perpetuate a conquest, to kill the soul of the subject nation, and the Japanese know it. A subject nation struggling for freedom must always attract Indian sympathy, but the Koreans have not the strength of soul to attain freedom. Instead of seeking the force to rise in their own manhood, they have always committed the unpardonable sin against Asiatic integrity of striving to call in an European power against a brother Asiatic. The Koreans have right on their side, but do not know how to awaken might to vindicate the right. The Japanese cause is wrong from the stand-point of a higher morality than the merely patriotic, but they believe intensely in their religion of patriotic duty and put all their might into its observance. It is not difficult to predict with which side the victory will be.

Prince Hirobumi Ito was the typical man of his nation, as well as its greatest statesman and leader. He went ahead of it for a while only to raise it to his level. He had all its virtues in over-flowing measure and a full share of its defects and vices. Absolutely selfless in public affairs, quiet, unassuming, keeping himself in the background unless duty called him into prominence, calm, self-controlled, patient, swift, energetic, methodical, incapable of fear, wholly devoted to the nation—such is the Japanese, and such was Ito. As a private man he had the Japanese defects. Even in public affairs, he had something of the narrowness, unscrupulousness in method and preference of success to justice of the insular and imperial Japanese type. Added to these common characteristics of his people he had a genius equal to that of any statesman in history. The eye that read the hearts of men, the mouth sealed to rigid secrecy, the rare, calm and effective speech, the brain that could embrace a civilisation at a glance and take all that was needed for his purpose, the swift and yet careful intellect that could divine, choose and arrange, the power of study, the genius of invention, the talent of application, a diplomacy open-minded but never vacillating, a tireless capacity for work,—all these he had on so grand a scale that to change the world's history was to him a by no means stupendous labour. And he had the ancient Asiatic gift of self-effacement. In Europe a genius of such colossal proportions would have filled the world with the mighty bruit of his personality; but Ito worked in silence and in the shade, covering his steps, and it was only by the results of his work that the world knew him. Like many modern Japanese, Ito was a sceptic. His country was the God of his worship to whom he dedicated his life, for whom he lived and in whose service he died. Such was this great vibhuti, who came down to earth in a petty family, an Eastern island clan, a nation apart and far behind in the world's progress, and in forty years created a nation's greatness, founded an Empire, changed a civilisation and prepared the liberation of a continent. His death was worthy of his life. For there are only two deaths which are really great and carry a soul to the highest heaven, to die in self-forgetting action, in battle, by assassination, on the scaffold for others, for one's country or for the right, and to die as the Yogin dies, by his own will, free of death and disease, departing into that from which he came. To Ito, the sceptic, the patriot, the divine worker, the death of the selfless hero was given.

THE HINDU SABHA.

An indication of the immense changes which are coming over our country, is the sudden leaping into being of new movements and organisations which are, by their very existence, evidence of revolutions in public feeling and omens of the future. The dead bones live indeed and the long sleep of the ages is broken. The Moslem League was indicative of much, the Hindu Sabha is indicative of yet more. The Nationalist party, while in entire disagreement with the immediate objects and spirit of the league, welcomed its birth as a sign of renovated political life in the Mahomedan community. But the Mahomedan community was always coherent, united and separately self-conscious. The strength of Islam lay in its unity and cohesion, the fruit of a long discipline in equality and brotherhood, the strength of the Hindu in flexibility, progressiveness, elasticity, a divination of necessary changes, broad ideas, growing aspirations, the fruit of a long discipline in intellectual and moral sensitiveness. The Moslem league meant that the Mahomedan was awakening to the need of change, the growth of aspiration in the world around him,—not yet to the broad ideas modern life demanded. The Hindu Sabha means that the Hindu is awakening to the need of unity and cohesion.

Does it mean more? Does it indicate a larger statesmanship, quicker impulse to action, a greater capacity for the unity and cohesion it seeks? Is the Hindu Sabha a novel body, with the power in it to effect a great object never before accomplished, the effective union of all shades of Hindu opinion from the lax Anglicised Agnostic, Hindu in nothing but birth and blood, to the intense and narrow worshipper of the institutes of Raghunandan? Or is it merely an ineffectual aspiration, like the old Congress, capable of creating a general sympathy and oneness of aim, but not of practical purpose and effective organisation? There are only two things strong enough to unite Hinduism, a new spiritual impulse based on Vedanta, the essential oneness of man, the transcendence and utilitarian character of institutions, the lofty ideals of brotherhood, freedom, equality, and a recognition of the great mission and mighty future of the Hindu spiritual ideas and discipline and of the Indian race, or else a political impulse strong enough to unite Hindus together for the preservation and advancement of their community. The Hindu Sabha could not have come into being but for the great national movement which awakened the national spirit, the sense of past greatness, the divination of a mighty future, transforming the whole spirit and character of the educated community. But we fear that in its immediate inception and work it leans for its hope of success on a lower and less powerful motive—rivalry with Mahomedan pretensions and a desire to put the mass and force of an united Hinduism against the intensity of a Mahomedan self-assertion supported by official patronage and Anglo-Indian favour. Alarm and resentment at the pro-Mahomedan policy underlying the Reform Scheme and dissatisfaction with the Bombay conventionists for their suicidal support of the Government policy entered largely into the universal support given by Punjab Hindus to the new body and its great initial success. Mortification at the success of Mahomedans in securing Anglo-Indian sympathy and favour and the exclusion of Hindus from those blissful privileges figured largely in the speech of Sir Pratul Chandra Chatterji who was hailed as the natural leader of Panjab Hinduism. These are not good omens. It is not by rivalry for Anglo-Indian favour, it is not by quarrelling for the loaves and fishes of British administration that Hinduism can rise into an united and effective force. If the Hindu Sabha takes its anchor on these petty aspirations or, if it founds any part of its strength on political emulation with the Mahomedans, it will be impossible for the Nationalist party to join in a movement which would otherwise have their full sympathy and eager support.

Lala Lajpat Rai struck a higher note, that of Hindu nationalism as a necessary preliminary to a greater Indian Nationality. We distrust this ideal. Not that we are blind to facts, not that we do not recognize Hindu-Mahomedan rivalry as a legacy of the past enhanced and not diminished by British ascendancy, a thing that has to be faced and worked out either by mutual concession or by a struggle between nationalism and separatism. But we do not understand Hindu nationalism as a possibility under modern conditions. Hindu nationalism had a meaning in the times of Shivaji and Ramdas, when the object of national revival was to overthrow a Mahomedan domination which, once tending to Indian unity and toleration, had become oppressive and disruptive. It was possible because India was then a world to itself and the existence of two geographical units entirely Hindu, Maharashtra and Rajputana, provided it with a basis. It was necessary because the misuse of their domination by the Mahomedan element was fatal to India's future and had to be punished and corrected by the resurgence and domination of the Hindu. And because it was possible and necessary, it came into being. But under modern conditions India can only exist as a whole. A nation depends for its existence on geographical separateness and geographical compactness, on having a distinct and separate country. The existence of this geographical separateness is sure in the end to bear down all differences of race, language, religion, history. It has done so in Great Britain, in Switzerland, in Germany. It will do so in India. But geographical compactness is also necessary. In other words, the desh or country must be so compact that mutual communication and the organisation of a central government becomes easy or, at least, not prohibitively difficult. The absence of such compactness is the reason why great Empires are sure in the end to fall to pieces; they cannot get the support of that immortal and indestructible national self which can alone ensure permanence. This difficulty stands in the way of British Imperial Federation and is so great that any temporary success of that specious aspiration will surely result in the speedy disruption of the Empire. In addition, there must be an uniting force strong enough to take advantage of the geographical compactness and separateness,—either a wise and skilfully organised government with a persistent tradition of beneficence, impartiality and oneness with the nation, or else a living national sense insisting on its separate inviolability and self-realisation. The secret of Roman success was in the organisation of such a Government; even so, it failed, for want of geographical compactness, to create a world-wide Roman nationality. The failure of the British rule to root itself lies in its inability to become one with the nation either by the effacement of our national individuality or by the renunciation of its own separate pride and self-interest. These things are therefore necessary to Indian nationality, geographical compactness, geographical compactness and a living national spirit. The first was always ours and made India a people apart from the earliest times. The second we have attained by British rule. The third has just sprung into existence.

But the country, the swadesh, which must be the base and foundation of our nationality, is India, a country where Mahomedan and Hindu live intermingled and side by side. What geographical base can a Hindu nationality possess? Maharashtra and Rajasthan are no longer separate geographical units but merely provincial divisions of a single country. The very first requisite of a Hindu nationalism is wanting. The Mahomedans base their separateness and their refusal to regard themselves as Indians first and Mahomedans afterwards on the existence of great Mahomedan nations to which they feel themselves more akin, in spite of our common birth and blood, than to us. Hindus have no such resource. For good or evil, they are bound to the soil and to the soil alone. They cannot deny their Mother, neither can they mutilate her. Our ideal therefore is an Indian Nationalism, largely Hindu in its spirit and traditions, because the Hindu made the land and the people and persists, by the greatness of his past, his civilisation and his culture and his invincible virility, in holding it, but wide enough also to include the Moslem and his culture and traditions and absorb them into itself. It is possible that the Mahomedan may not recognize the inevitable future and may prefer to throw himself into the opposite scale. If so, the Hindu, with what little Mahomedan help he may get, must win Swaraj both for himself and the Mahomedan in spite of that resistance. There is a sufficient force and manhood in us to do a greater and more difficult task than that, but we lack unity, brotherhood, intensity of single action among ourselves. It is to the creation of that unity, brotherhood and intensity that the Hindu Sabha should direct its whole efforts. Otherwise we must reject it as a disruptive and not a creative agency.

THE BRAIN OF INDIA.

III

The practice of Brahmacharya is the first and most necessary condition of increasing the force within and turning it to such uses as may benefit the possessor or mankind. All human energy has a physical basis. The mistake made by European materialism is to suppose the basis to be everything and confuse it with the source. The source of life and energy is not material but spiritual, but the basis, the foundation on which the life and energy stand and work, is physical. The ancient Hindus clearly recognised this distinction between Karan and pratishta, the north pole and the south pole of being. Earth or gross matter is the pratishta, Brahma or spirit is the Karan. To raise up the physical to the spiritual is Brahmacharya for by the meeting of the two the Energy which starts from one and produces the other, is enhanced and fulfils itself.

This is the metaphysical theory. The application depends on a right understanding of the physical and psychological conformation of human receptacle of energy. foundational physical unit is retas, in which the tejas, the light and electricity in a man is involved and hidden. All energy is latent in the retas. This energy may be either expended physically or conserved. All passion, all desire wastes the energy by pouring it, either in the gross form or sublimated subtler form, out of the body. Immorality in act throws out in the gross form; immorality of thought in the subtle form. In either case there is waste, and chastity is of the mind and speed well as of the body. On the other hand all self-control conserves energy in the retas, and conservation always brings with it increase. But the needs of the physical body are limited and the excess of energy must create a surplus which has to turn itself to some use other than the physical. According to ancient theory retas is jala, water, full of light and heat and electricity, in one word, of tejas. The excess of the retas turns first into heat or tapas which stimulates the whole system, and it is for this reason that all forms of self-control and austerity are called tapas or tapasya, because they generate the heat or stimulus which is a source of powerful action and success, secondly, it turns to tejas proper, light, the energy which is at the source of all knowledge; thirdly it turns to vidyut or electricity, which is at the basis of all forceful action, whether intellectual or physical. The vidyut again is involved in the pranas or pranasakti the primal energy which proceeds from ether. T

ojas refining from jala to tapas, rajas and vidyut and from vidyut to ojas, fills the system with physical strength, energy and brain power and in its last form of ojas rises to the brain and informs it with that primal energy which is the most refined form of matter and nearest to spirit. It is ojas that creates a spiritual force or virya, by which a man attains to spiritual knowledge, spiritual love and faith, spiritual strength. It follows, that the more we can by Brahmacharya, increase the store of tapas, tejas, vidyut and ojas, the more we shall fill ourselves with utter energy for the works of the body, heart, mind and spirit.

This view of the human soul was not the whole of the knowledge on which ancient Hinduism based its educational discipline. In addition it has the view that all knowledge is within and has to be evoked by education rather than instilled from outside. The constitution of man consists of three principles of nature sattwa, rajas and tamas, the comprehensive, active and passive elements of universal action which, in one of their thousand fold aspects manifested as knowledge, passion and ignorance. Tamas is a constitutional dullness or passivity which obscures the knowledge within and creates ignorance, mental inertia, slowness, forgetfulness, disinclination to study, inability to grasp and distinguish. Rajas is an undisciplined activity which obscures knowledge by passion, attachment, prejudgment, predilection and wrong ideas.

Sattwa is an illumination which reveals the hidden knowledge and brings it to the surface where the observation can grasp and the memory record it. This conception of the constitution of the knowing faculty made the removal of tamas, the disciplining of rajas and the awakening of sattwa the main problem for the teacher. He had to train the student to be receptive of illumination from within. The disciplining of rajas was effected by a strict moral discipline which induced a calm, clear, receptive state of mind free from intellectual self-will and pride and the obscuration of passion, —the famous discipline of the Brahmacharin which was the foundation of Aryan culture and Aryan morals; and the interference of wrong ideas was sought to be removed by strict mental submission to the teacher during the receptive period, when the body of ascertained knowledge or right ideas already in man's possession was explained to him and committed to memory. The removal of tamas was effected by the discipline of moral purity, which awakened the energy of tejas and electricity in the system and by the power of tapasya trained it to be a reservoir of mental force and clarity. The awakening of illumination was actively effected by the triple method of repetition, meditation and discussion. Avritti or repetition was meant to fill the recording part of the mind with the shabda or word, so that the artha or meaning might of itself rise from within. Needless to say, a mechanical repetition was not likely to produce this effect.

There must be that clear still receptivity and that waiting upon the word or thing with the contemplative part of the mind which is what the ancient Indians meant by dhyana or meditation. All of us have felt, when studying a language, the difficulties which seemed insoluble while grappling with a text, suddenly melt away and a clear understanding arise without assistance from book or teacher after putting away the book from our mind for a brief period. Many of us have experienced also, the strangeness of taking up a language or subject, after brief discontinuance, to find that we understand it much better than when we took it up, know the meanings of words we had never met with before and can explain sentences which before we discontinued the study, would have baffled our understanding. This is because the jnata or knower within has had his attention called to the subject and has been busy in the interval drawing upon the source of knowledge within in connection with it. This experience is only possible to those whose sattwic or illuminative element has been powerfully aroused or consciously or unconsciously trained to action by the habit of intellectual clarity and deep study. The highest reach of the sattwic development is when one can dispense often or habitually with outside aids, the teacher or the text book, grammar and dictionary and learn a subject largely or wholly from within. But this is only possible to the Yogin by a successful prosecution of the discipline of Yoga.

INVITATION.

( Composed in the Alipur Jarl. )

With wind and the weather beating round me

Up to the hill and the moorland I go.

Who will come with me ? Who will walk with me ?

Wade through the brook and tramp through the snow ?

Not in the petty circle of cities

Cramped by your doors and your walls I dwell.

Over me God is blue in the welkin,

Against me the storm and the wind rebel.

I sport with solitude here in my regions,

Of Misadventure I made me a friend.

Who would live largely ? Who would live freely ?

Here to the wind-swept uplands ascend.

I am the lord of tempest and mountain,

I am the spirit of freedom and pride.

Stark must he be and a kinsman to danger.

Who shares my kingdom and walks at my side.

The "Pioneer's" London correspondent writes—In the House of Commons, Dr. Rutherford asked the Master of Elibank whether he was aware that the Judge's summing-up in the case of Lala Lajpat Rai against the "Daily Express" mentioned Lala Lajpat Rai's deportation as a ground for mitigation of damages and whether since the Government refused to give Lala Lajpat Rai reasons for his deportation and an opportunity for rebutting the implications of guilt some amends would be made for the injustice done to him. The master of Elibank answered that he knew of no reasons for such an action.

A HYDERABAD COMMISSION.

A commission has been arranged at Hyderabad to undertake the arbitration of certain long outstanding claims and counter claims between the Nizam and the Sultans of Sheha and Mokalla in Southern Arabia. The parties will each be represented by one representative but as for the President it has been desirable to apply for a British officer of standing. The position has been offered to Mr. Justice Griffin of the Allahabad High Court. As the investigation is to commence as soon as possible it is probable that Mr. Justice Griffin will leave for Hyderabad at an early date. The inquiry is expected to last for about three months.

PUNJAB HINDU SABHA.

The reply of the Government of India to the memorial of the Punjab Hindu Sabha on certain grievances and disabilities of the Hindu in the province is published. The Government of India's reply traverses some of the statistics and says that the educational qualification though important and easiest of application is not and never has been accepted as the sole test of fitness, and that if the educational test were given pre-eminence the Hindu share of the posts in the Government service would be disproportionately great. About the Land Alienation and Pre-emption Acts the reply says that the Acts have benefited both the Mahomedan and Hindu agriculturists. About the representation of the Punjab Hindus in the Reformed Council the reply says that while the procedure is settled by the Secretary of state the rights of the important minorities would be safeguarded.

MYSORE PRESS REGULATION.

At the sitting of the Mysore Representative Assembly last week one of the subjects discussed was a proposal for the repeal of the Mysore Newspapers Regulation of 1908. If its repeal was not possible an amendment was prayed for repealing section 2 which necessitates the grant of permission by Government before starting a paper and providing for a judicial trial before an order for deportation or for confiscating a press etc., is passed and defining the various offences for which punishments is to be inflicted under the regulation. One speaker said he would not mind imprisonment but to be called disloyal was giving the whole State a black mark. The traditions of history point out that Mysore was ever loyal to the British throne. The Dewan, replying, said the regulation has been working satisfactorily and declined to consider the advisability of repealing or amending it.

KRISHNAGAR ITEM.

The pleaders of Krishnagar were recently the recipients of anonymous letters threatening them with bomb outrages. A notorious badmash, armed Yakub Mallah who had kidnapped a Hindu widow was undergoing trial before Mr. Ransom, Sessions Judge. Letters were sent to the Bar conveying threats of bomb. Any body the letters ran defending Yakub would be bombed in the very heart of Krishnagar. No Bengali pleader therefore took up the case, and Yakub engaged a Mahomedan counsel. But after the first day of the hearing nothing was heard of him and news comes that he abruptly left Krishnagar having received a strange letter through the post. Yakub Molla was sentenced to six years rigorous imprisonment and lodged in Krishnagar Jail. But on the second night he ordered two fellow convicts to give him a leg-up. So he jumped on their shoulders, scaled the wall in jail dress, burgled a Swadeshi cloth shop at midnight, obtained a change of dress and vanished. Rewards have been offered for his recapture. —Empire.

THE CYCLONE.

Report has been received from Berhampore (Gujjun) of a cyclone which passed over it on Tuesday night last, causing considerable damage to buildings from Kalkota to Madras. Owing to telegraphic interruption the exact extent of damage and loss of life cannot be ascertained. It is however reported that many houses have been blown down in Berhampore and that two in-patients of the Jubilee Hospital have been killed owing to the partial collapse of a wing of the building. The Railway line is breached at Kalkota and passengers and mails are being transhipped. There has been no train service since the day before yesterday between Kalkota and Palsae.

BENGALI TOURISTS.

In view of the Viceroy's visit to Jaipur stringent measures have been adopted by the State regarding Bengali tourists. Even respectable shines at Jaipur and Amber are not allowed entrance into the town without being subjected to most scrutinising police searches. Mr. P. P. Bose proprietor of the Calcutta vernacular weekly, "Bangabasi" with four other members of the staff of the "Telegraph" and the "Bangabasi" had to undergo similar search. He was not given shelter even by a Bengali State official nor was he allowed to rent a house for staying only for a night. He was distinctly told that he could only stay there under police surveillance outside the city in one of the huts where all Bengalis had to stay. Eventually however through the kindness of the European Station-Master of Jaipur he was allowed stay in the waiting room till the Agra mail came. Learning moreover from reliable sources that the same stringent measures were adopted in other Rajput States to be visited by the Viceroy Mr. B. P. Bose and party were obliged to cancel further arrangements for visiting other shrines and leave Jaipur for Agra that very night.

PATIALA SEDITION.

The latest news regarding the Patiala sedition case is that Mr. Rushanlal Bhatnagar appeared before the Special Tribunal on the 28th and stated that although fifteen days had elapsed from the date of the arrests, yet Mr. Warburton Inspector-General of Police has not sent in the papers of the case nor released Chiranjali, admitted to bail by the Special Tribunal on the 18th. Mr. Rushanlal, therefore petitioned to His Highness the Maharaja stating all the facts. His Highness sent the petition to the Special Tribunal as on the 29th he did not attend Court. Twenty days have elapsed since the arrests were made, still the accused and their counsel are in the dark as regards the nature of the complaint.

YOUNG TURKEY.

ITS MILITARY POWER.

The Balkan correspondent of the "Nation" writes:—To an English mind—at least to the mind of an Englishman brought up in the old Whig distrust of great armies—one of the most disquieting features in the Turkish outlook is militarism.

In the first place the internal political situation in Turkey is so much the reverse of all we are accustomed to in England that one feels instinctively suspicious of it. The army is liberal, and is maintaining liberal institutions. The country is mostly reactionary and would overthrow the Parliament if it could. When the despot does overthrow the Chamber it is the army that rushes to the assistance of the latter not the community.

When we come to consider the matter more closely, we find that the July revolution was caused by army officers who were ashamed of the weak condition into which the armed forces of the Empire had fallen under the Absolutist regime. They said, "Only the other day we were at the gates of Vienna and all Europe trembled before us. To-day we are nothing. Let us abolish the system which has brought our glorious arms so low. Let us establish a Parliament in order that our army may be re-organised and that Europe may again have to take us into account."

As far as I could see the military leaders of the Committee went no further than this, unless incidentally. All their reforms all their new-found tolerance, originated in their regard for Turkey's military strength. In July last they fraternised with the Greek and Bulgarian brigands in Macedonia because these brigands might help them in the march on Constantinople which Young Turks then thought unavoidable. Ahmed Riza Bey and some of the civilians had broader views than this but they did not and do not count. It was the military leaders who made the revolution of July and of April and who are maintaining the Constitution. And though the military chiefs act but never speak or write, they are the only good statesmen and politicians in Turkey. The civilians make endless blunders. Their journalistic controversies did much to bring about the April reaction but save, perhaps, when he threatened to march on Athens—Shefket Pasha has invariably done the right thing.

The army therefore, has all the brains all the power and all the discretion. And as its one great object is to improve itself, to increase its size and its efficiency, it has progressed enormously in every direction since July 1908. True the April manning lost it a whole army corps but the misfortune only gave it an opportunity to show its power, for the rapidity with which Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha got together a new army corps and licked the recruits into shape before the end of July was remarkable.

The War Office (as I observed during a visit I paid to the commander of the First Army Corps there a couple of months ago) is now by far the busiest and most efficient of the Government departments. Filled with able Generals and hard-working chiefs of staff and staff-officers it would do credit to the headquarters of a German army corps. More money is spent on it than on any other department. Even the ludicrously inadequate Budget of the Minister of Education was recently cut down in order that the army might have been more money to spend.

In the Chamber the army has the control and means to keep it. Recently a motion was made to the effect that officers on active service could not sit as deputies without forfeiting their pay as officers. A civilian member pointed out that the popularity of the army and attraction of double pay will lead to the Chamber being filled exclusively with officers but military members protested against the motion and it failed to pass.

The tone of all the Turks is, I deeply regret to say, not that of a constitutional people. It is as a rule that of an army. The "Yeni Gazette" recently drew a parallel between Japan and Turkey, but it failed to see the extremely important role which Japan's attention to commerce industry and finance has played in the uplifting of Dai-Nippon all it saw was first that Japan devoted all her energies to building up her military and naval forces and second, that having done this she turned her attention to the contraction of an alliance.

Eyver Bey, the Turkish military attaché in Berlin, speaks in a warlike tone about Turkey stationing an army-corps on the Russo-Turkish frontier in Asia Minor; and Hussein Hilmi Bey, the comparatively peaceful Grand Vizier, says, in speaking of Turkey's future:—

"We must try to make of Turkey a military Power of the first order, to have a well-organised and instructed army, a powerful fleet," etc., etc., afterwards, going on to speak of secondary things, such as railways, industry, and commerce, and—last of all—schools.

To a certain extent this military spirit is natural and excusable in the Turks, but I am afraid that it will make them too proud, too Chauvinistic, and, at the same time (for, after all, they are a simple people), too likely to become the tool of European Powers which may seek to excite them on the subject of Egypt, India, Persia, Crete, or Mahomedanism generally.

The "Seman" of Salonica recently published, apropos of the murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie, a ferocious article, entitled "Peoples of Asia, to arms!" in which it preached the solidarity of all the Asiatic Peoples in the face of Europe's mania for expansion at their expense, and painted the wrongs of Asia in glaring colors. In the same way a leading and very able Turkish deputy, who edits a paper called "Le Courier D'Orient," said (July 23rd), that Turkey also must have her "point of view on the Polish, Scandinavian, and even on the Irish question."

The army, of course, goes even further than this in its martial pride. When the Cretan question was acute, Mahmud Sheiket spoke of a march on Athens, and the 4th Army Corps wired to Constantinople, offering its services against Greece "in case the 2nd and 3rd Army Corps are too tired after their exertions of April 24th." On the same occasion a Turkish paper, addressing itself menacingly to the Government, said that "the Cabinet must not think that the sceptre of power is a stick to lean on idly," meaning that the sceptre is in its opinion a "big stick" wherewith a Government should be for ever laying about it and which is in fact intended for no other purpose.

This is the naive and martial temper of the Turk—how different, by the way, to the restrained and diplomatic Japanese temper, how similar in some respects to the tone of the foolish young Chinese who talked so loudly some time ago of abolishing extra-territoriality and who have now under the reactionary "regime" of Prince Ching, subsided so suddenly and so completely.

Russian Publicists are already expressing apprehensions that Germany may make a cat's-paw of the Ottomans. A Constantinopolitan Russian, writing in the "Novoe Vremya" of August 5th, points to the extraordinary reception given to von der Goltz Pasha on his return to Turkey (a reception which would never be given by the Turks to Tolstoy or to the greatest leaders of European thought), when at the railway station all the officers of higher rank than Generals publicly kissed von der Goltz's hand. This German instructor was soon after made Vice-President of the Higher Military Council, and, at his instance, seventeen more German officers are to come to Turkey to teach, while twenty-nine Turkish officers are to go to Germany to learn. Moreover, at the instance of General von der Goltz, the Higher Military Council has decided, in spite of Turkey's serious financial weakness soon to re-arm the whole army with Mausers and to order 400 quick-firing batteries. All these things, as well as vast quantities of ammunition, will be bought in Germany.

The Russian writer whom I quote is somewhat afraid of a Turkey which is only the puppet of Germany, for such a Turkey could be used to bring pressure on St. Petersburg. In 1877-1878 the Russians found it very hard to overcome the resistance of 350,000 Turks "badly armed, half naked, and hungry, commanded by an infinitesimal number of educated officers—nine per cent. of the whole." At present the Turkish army numbers about one million. "On our Caucasian frontier we would have now against us, not 50,000 bayonets, as was the case thirty two years ago, but 145,000 bayonets, and 50,000 sabres—all the men being well organised, well armed, and well officered.

I shall not follow the Russian writer into his descriptions of how Germany worked up the Turks on the subject of Russia's proceedings in Persia, and how he got the Grand Vizier to invite many Germanophile Bulgarian students and officers to visit Constantinople by way of reply to Russia's invitation of a number of Russophile Bulgarian officers to St. Petersburg.

The broad fact remains, however, that Germany not philosophic, poetical, literary, or scientific Germany, but military Germany alone seems to have hypnotised the Turks. It may be passing phase, but it bodes ill for the general development of Young Turkey.

Germany, of course, is not to be blamed for this, since wherever they go—whether to Tokio or to Stambul—her military instructors do their work extraordinarily well, and, as a matter of fact, we ourselves, the peaceful, anti-militarist nation of Europe, have lent Turkey an admiral in order to carry out a most unnecessary and expensive task—the re-organisation of her fleet.

The whole evil lies in Turkey's inability at present really to admire or understand anything European save military efficiency, and in her coming just at this moment under the influence of a Power where militarism plays such an important role that it must seem to be the unique cause of Germany's greatness.

Turkey it is hard to blame, and I certainly do not mean this letter to be an attack on the new "regime." It cannot, of course, be expected to change in a day that military character for which the Osmanli have been noted ever since they first appeared in history.

I strongly approve of almost everything the Young Turks have done so far, and I am proud to be able to claim some of the Committee leaders as my personal friends, but I think that their intensely martial spirit is an historical fact that should be noted even by a sincere friend. European observers have shut their eyes to it so far, but that does not improve matters in the least.

BEHAREE STUDENTS.

GAYA CONFERENCE.

The fourth session of the Beharee Students' Conference began its sitting at 12 noon 30 October, when the President-elect (Mr. Syed Hasan Imam), accompanied by Messrs. Deep Narayan Singh, Mohamed Yunus, Parmeshwar Lall, and the Hon. Babu Krishna Sahay were received with prolonged cheers. The proceedings began with a beautiful song. Babu Rajeshwari Prasad, President to the Reception Committee, welcomed the delegates in a suitable speech. He deplored the inadequacy of educational facilities in Behar, and advocated the establishment of a college in Gaya. Babu Seeshwar Dayal proposed, and Babu Prasannarayan seconded, the election of Mr. Syed Hasan Imam as President in a nice speech.

Mr. Syed Hasan Imam, who was received with loud applause, then delivered his inaugural address.

He complimented the Conference on its non-sectarian character, in which Beharee students, Hindus and Mahomedans met on a common platform to discuss measures for their common advancement. It is from the members of the Conference, the President said, the historic province of Behar hopes to supply her share of zealous workers in the cause of the Motherland. He exhorted the students to preserve non-sectarian character and spirit of mutual compromise intact when they enter the world: it is then that they will have to show great strength of character to have them from the infamy which attaches to one who has preached one principle and practised another. Let the Motherland be the first in your affections, your province the second, and your community hereafter.

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

Speaking on the question of students and politics, Mr. Hasan Imam declared he was not one of those who would shut young men from the study of politics. In the general unrest that prevails in the land, to ask the student community not to be affected is to ask nature to alter its laws. Educational authorities may formulate their disciplinary rules; yet they cannot coerce the young mind to concentrate itself on things ethereal when the din and noise at the College gates proclaimed the demand of the people for political right. He referred to the abuse heaped on Mr. Gokhale for his political wisdom of accommodation and compromise and to the discredit of the once trusted leader of the Muslim League, Mr. Ali Imam, "because he refused to urge, in their aggressiveness, the unrighteous pretensions of a band of political jumpers, who have preached the creed that all is for them and they for nobody." The frantic cries of Mahomedan, would never have rent the air and disturbed the calm of national progress were it not for the want of that political study of men and manners which gives grace and dignity to the movement of a people. The agitation of mild Bengal and the irritation of the stern Punjab, Mr. Hasan Imam went on, the settled gloom of the United Provinces and the declarations of placid Bombay, over the all consuming demand of the Muslim League, bring conviction to my mind that the need is most urgent that the tractable mind of the young student should be trained, while it is yet receptive, to develop common ideals of national life and sentiment.

Referring to the disgraceful incidents which have taken place in the country within recent times, Mr. Hasan Imam said that the need was all the greater that young men's patriotic sentiment should be guided on proper lines and new spirit utilized in the interest of order, peace and progress. Nobody will have the unwisdom, said the President, to say that students will be advancing the interests of their country if they rush into active politics. "But I hold strongly to the view," said Mr. Hasan Imam, "that it will be a sin on our part to leave you without guidance to evolve a code of political morals out of the perplexities of the present situation." He, with Mr. Arundale of the Benares Hindu College, advocated the imparting of political education to the College students.

He next referred to the condition of women and the depressed classes. Social obligations, he said, preceded politics and not politics social conditions.

A NUDDEA DACOITY.

SIX YOUTHS ARRESTED.

Information of what appears to be a well-planned dacoity committed in the Nuddea District reached on Thursday the Government Railway Police Sealdah. It is reported that a large body of young men armed with deadly weapons including guns suddenly appeared on Wednesday night in Haludbari Bazar and looted the shops carrying off cash and ornaments of considerable value. The Dowhitpur Police on receipt of the news opened an investigation. On Thursday the police arrested six youths who are alleged to be implicated in the dacoity.

Further particulars which reached the Government Railway Police at Sealdah on Friday, went to show that the six Bengali youths who have been arrested in connection with the dacoity committee on Wednesday night in Haludbari Bazar in the Nuddea District are residents of Calcutta and had proceeded to the Nuddea District. Some of them, it is said, are students, and their respective ages are from 18 to 25 years. They are also said to be respectably connected. On the morning following the dacoity the Police found the young men in a field near the Mairwah Station, and as they were unable to render a satisfactory account of themselves they were arrested. No stolen property was found in their possession, neither have they made any statements yet of an incriminating character. The Police decline to disclose their names at present. Further enquiries are proceedings.

BRAHMA CHRYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE : The true builder of the Nation.

BY

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras :—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad) :—

"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon)—

"Bramacharyya describes the life which Bramachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture of students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

FACTS AND OPINIONS

— 000 —

House Searches.

One wonders what would happen in any European country if the police as a recompense for their utter inefficiency and detective incapacity were armed with the power and allowed to use it freely of ransacking the houses of respectable citizens, ransacking the property of absent occupants and leaving it unsold and unprotected, carrying off the business books of Presses, newspapers and other commercial concerns, the private letters of individuals, books publicly sold and proemable in every bookshop, violating the sanctity of correspondence between wife and husband, searching the persons of ladies of the house even though it be by female hands and trampling on the sanctity of the home, the dignity of the person and the respect which every race worthy of existence holds to be dearer than itself. And all this in spite of the fact, exemplified a hundred times over, that these inquiries are wholly infructuous and can serve no purpose but harassment and exasperation. Usually the searches are undertaken, if we do not err, on the vague information of disreputable hirelings used as spies and informers, the statements of young apprentices or to save the trouble of guarding innocent men, and confessions to the police of arrested prisoners made either for the same purpose or dictated by a morbid vanity and high-headed braggadoero which invents facts and details in order to give dignity to petty crime and magnitude to small and foolish undertakings. The ludicrously irrelevant and needless nature of the articles which are usually the reward of this whole activity merits sufficient consideration. Even in the wide-protection policy dreamed of by the authorities, were in fact, as it is conceivable that respectable men, knowing this police to be on the alert, would risk liberty and property by storing bomb-laden ornaments or treacherous correspondence in their houses? We are aware that the right of house-search is a necessary weapon in the hands of authority for the suppression of crime, but it was never meant that this should be misused in order to supply the place of detective dexterity in the Police. House searches are unwarrantable unless the information on which they proceed is precise, reliable and highly probable. Judging from result, no one of these epithets can be applied to the numerous searches which are now becoming a standing feature of life in Bengal. And if the search of the persons of ladies is to become another common feature of life in domestic visits, we fear that the patience of a people passionately sensitive on these matters will not long endure the strain. Surely the higher authorities ought to have sufficient good sense to draw the inevitable conclusion from experience, perceive the limitation of this weapon and, if not for the possible evil consequences of creating still greater disaffection, yet for its barren utility, renounce its excessive use.

Social Reform and Politics.

There are two methods of progress, two compelling motives from which great changes and far-reaching reforms can be effected. One is the struggle of selfish interests between man and man, class and class, working out progress by ignoble strife, the forced compromise and convenient barter of the lower kind of politics. The other is the impulse and clash of mighty ideas, noble aspirations, great national or humanitarian aims, the struggle which impregnates and in its upward march creates empires and nations. Both are freely used by the Master of the world in His careful providence and various economy. Often they are intermingled. But it cannot be doubted which is most healthful to the individual, the nation and the race. The social result worked out by a bitter and selfish struggle between opposing and lower classes, labor and Capital, is one thing; the harmony created by a mighty enthusiasm, such as led the aristocracy of Japan to lay down their exclusive privileges and, without reserve, call upon the masses to come up and share their high culture, their seats of might and their ennobling traditions is quite another. Hindu society in the mofussil is now bitterly divided, and tends more and more to be convulsed, by the new aspirations of the lower castes and the inability of the higher to decide how they will meet the demand. It is a bad sign that the action of both sides tends more and more to be selfish and narrow, political in the worst sense of the word. To barter help in Swadeshi or faithfulness to Hinduism for local privileges, or to bribe the masses to Swadeshim by petty and calculated concessions will tend neither to the genuineness of the Swadeshi sentiment, nor the strength of the national movement, nor the dignity and purity of our religion. It is an evil and foreign principle which has entered into our system, one of the many evil results of our disastrous contact with European civilisation at a time of national weakness and disintegration and our attempt to assimilate it without first vindicating our inner liberty and establishing ourselves as free agents. A great social revolution in this ancient society ought only to come as the fruit of a mighty national, humanitarian and religious impulse. The fault of the present state of things rests largely with the waning insight and statesmanship of the Brahmins. Formerly, they would not have been wanting either in concerted action, largeness of view or skillfulness of device. It was not their wont to stand still in an inert and impossible conservatism but to recognise circumstances and meet them without sacrificing the essence of their religion or the basic principles of Hindu society.

The Deogha Sadhu

Recently some of the Bengali papers have contained detailed information of the feat of a Sadhu who buried himself for some days not, as in the wellknown Panjab case, giving up his outward consciousness and entering into the jala samadhi or inert inner existence but in full possession of his outer senses and conversing at times from his living tomb with visitors outside. The correspondent of the Bengaler tells us that the local people were dissatisfied with the Sadhu because the peculiar power he evinced was unattended by any moral elevation or true ascetic qualities. It is a general delusion that the power thus shown is a very great and almost supernatural siddhi and ought to be in the possession only of very highly developed souls. A false Indian tradition is partly responsible for the error; partly, it is due to the supreme ignorance of the deeper secrets of our being which belongs to the limited and self-satisfied materialistic Science of Europe now dominant in our midst. There is nothing wonderful in the feat of the Deoghur sadhu, which was the result of the conquest of the breath, pranayam, achieved by certain physical and mental processes and not necessarily dependent on moral or spiritual progress. The kumbhak or retention of the prana, dispensing with the process of inbreathing and outbreathing, is the final achievement of the process and the kumbhak can, when thoroughly conquered, be continued for an indefinite period. Given the power of kumbhak, it is obvious that one can stay under water or earth or in a room hermetically sealed for as long as the state continues. The power of stopping the heartbeats, dispensing with the process of breathing, and other of the outworks of Yogic knowledge and achievement are being slowly established in order to break down the exclusive pride of European Science and prepare for a new order of knowledge and a greater science to which its dogmatic narrowness is bitterly and scornfully opposed.

THE GREAT ELECTION.

It is not often that we care to dwell lengthily on the incidents of English politics in which, as a rule, India is not concerned nor affected by the results. A Bradrick to a Hamilton or a Morley to a Brodrick succeeds, and the sublime continuity of British policy, continuous in nothing else but this one determination to maintain absolutism in India, takes care that India shall have no reason to interest herself in Imperial affairs. The present crisis in England, however, is so momentous and its results so incalculable that it is impossible to say that India will not be affected by its gigantic issues. The importance of the election turns not upon the issues of the Budget, though these are of no small magnitude, but upon the great constitutional question of the House of Lords and its veto. The veto of the House of Lords is the drag on the Parliamentary locomotive. It is the one obstacle that stands between England and a peaceful revolution. It is true that this veto has been exercised very sparingly and only when the Liberals have introduced measures of a revolutionary character or containing clauses which meant a too rapid subversion of ancient landmarks and safeguards; but this is precisely the use in the British Constitution of the otherwise useless, ineffective and somnolent upper House. It has used the veto if not with perfect wisdom, yet with a moderation and an eye to its own safety that betokened at least a perfect discretion. In spite of this reserve the obstruction offered by the Lords to Liberal measures and their complacent acceptance of conservative legislation has become more and more exasperating to the Liberal party and has often threatened a collision which was averted either by the submission of the Lords or the support of its obstructive policy by the electors at the polls. So long as the social preponderance of the aristocracy and the possession of land and wealth, on which that preponderance rested, was not touched, the Lords have submitted to the gradual loss of political preponderance and the slow advance of England from an aristocratic to a middle class rule and even from a middle class rule to a limited democracy, limited by the existence of the Lords themselves and the restriction of the franchise. A new force, a fatal solvent of established institutions, has entered European politics with the steady slow irresistible advance of Socialism, and England, long exempt from the working of this great tide of idealistic thought, is being more and more swiftly undermined, its cherished ideals sapped, its ad-administrative and social structure threatened by the wash of the advancing waters. The uneasiness engendered in the more richly propertied classes by this advance of the destroyer has come to a head as a result of the provisions of the Budget by which the land, emblem and guarantee of English Conservatism, of the inviolability of private property and the survival of the old world society in its most vital features, has been subjected to substantial taxation. The innovation creates a probability of continued nibbling until under the impulse of a growing Socialism, land is nationalised, its proprietors bought out, and aristocracy destroyed. The Lords have either to resist the process in its first step or make up their minds to gradual extinction.

The question for the Upper House is how they will resist. It is open to them either to reject the Budget altogether—a measure of too drastic severity, to throw out the Land clauses, a device which will expose the Peers to the charge of violating the unwritten Constitution for the selfish purpose of saving their own pockets and throwing the burden of taxation on the middle class and the working men,—or to amend the Budget so as to lighten the land taxes and deprive them of their more inoffensive features. The last device has the disadvantage of being no more than a palliative, while it amounts to as serious a breach of the financial privilege of the House of Commons as the others. The omens point to a rejection of the bill by the Peers, but we doubt whether they will care to incur the odium of so disturbing the finances of the country. In all probability they will amend and leave to the Ministry the responsibility of dissolving Parliament with no Budget sanctioned and the insecurity to the taxpayers resulting from this unprecedented and anomalous situation. The burden of choice will then fall upon the Commons, who must either submit to the destruction of the first and most essential safeguard of popular liberty in England, the popular control of taxation and the Exchequer, or take up the challenge given by the Peers. The first course is unthinkable. No Liberal Ministry especially, would care to go down to posterity as having betrayed the people of England and the future of democracy by such a sacrifice of the palladium of British liberty. Mr. Asquith may either dissolve as soon as the Lords refuse to withdraw their amendments or he may ask the King to create a number of Liberal Peers large enough to swamp the Conservative majority in the Lords, or he may at once bring in a bill for the limitation of the veto of the upper House and dissolve upon it so as to raise definitely the question of the veto as the one real issue before the electors. The first course has this great disadvantage, that the real issues may be covered over by the clamour of the Conservative party against the socialistic trend of the new taxation and by the cry of Tariff Reform. By dint of repeated iteration the conservatives have created an impression in many minds that the present Ministry is deeply tinged with Socialism and the Budget a deliberate attack on property. The effect this cry is having on the mind of the wealthier classes is shown by the number of defections in the Liberal ranks, not so many, however, as might have been expected,—and the diminution of the Liberal vote at the bye elections. The Budget opens the door to Socialism, but is in none of its provisions Socialistic, the only real novelty of importance being the land taxes which have their counterpart in countries the reverse of Socialistic. The Ministry is itself a curious conglomeration of Moderates, Radicals, and extreme Radicals, but there is not a single socialist in its ranks and many of its members are avowedly anti-Socialistic in their temper and opinions. Nevertheless, the cry is having its effect on the susceptible British elector and, unless it is met, will impel a great number of Liberal seats. The cry of Tariff Reform has its charm for a certain number of working men, but is not in itself so formidable as the catchword of Property in Danger. To dissolve upon the rejection of the Budget will have the effect of preventing a clear issue from being raised and confusing the public mind by the entanglement of three separate questions, Socialism and the Budget, Free Trade or Tariff Reform, and the veto of the House of Lords. The Ministry have everything to lose, the Opposition everything to gain by this confusion of issues.

The second device is being urged upon the Prime Minister by some of his supporters who are rather shortsighted politicians than men with the outlook of the statesman. The temporary difficulty would no doubt be surmounted, but it is a matter of unfailing experience that Liberal Peers so created gravitate in a very short time to Conservatism. If these Peers had to be actually created, the Liberal Ministry would very soon be face to face again with a similar situation, and the drastic remedy of doubling the bulk of the House of Lords could not be repeated ad infinitum. On the other hand, if the Peers yielded in order to avoid so great an indignity to their rank and order, they would do so under the most rigorous compulsion and be all the more eager to hamper and distress their victors in less vital matters. Mr. Asquith would avoid a particular difficulty, but only to perpetuate the great stumbling block of all Liberal Ministries—a permanently Conservative Upper House. On the other hand he has a chance, if he boldly seizes on this issue, avoiding a fight on the weaker points of the Budget, of forcing to the forefront a great constitutional issue in which everything Liberal or even truly conservative in England ought to be on his side, and destroying at one blow and for ever this perpetual thorn in the side of Liberalism and obstacle to radical legislation.

The drastic device of swamping the Lords with newly created Liberal Peers will be too much needed shortly to be thrown away now. When in the new Parliament, the bill for the limitation of the Peers' veto has been carried through the Commons, it will have to be carried through the Lords as well before it can receive the King's sanction and become law, and since the Lords as they are will not consent to their own nullification, it is only by the swamping device that this great resolution can be effected. The only question is whether the bill should be brought in before or postponed till after the election. To bring in the bill before, pass it formally through the Commons without permitting much debate and immediately dissolve for a mandate from the country, would be the boldest but also the best policy for Ministers. It would definitely raise the question as the one issue of the election and, if confined to the limitation and not the destruction of the veto, so as to avoid the charge of destroying the constitution, would rally the whole force of Liberalism behind Mr. Asquith. We do not know whether the course has suggested itself to the tacticians of the party, but it seems to us that it gives the only chance of a really effective and victorious electioneering campaign.

With all this, what are the chances of a Liberal victory? Very small, unless the Labour-Socialist vote is conciliated. The great feature of the recent bye-elections has been the repeated splitting of the democratic vote between Labourite and Liberal, the substantiality of the Labour vote and the consequent defeat of the Ministerial candidate and return of the Conservative in spite of a democratic majority in the constituency. For the Socialist party this is the right policy, by their independent attitude on an occasion of such vital importance to convince the Liberals that they cannot hope to exist as a power without coming to terms with the Socialist vote. But for the Liberals to accept a triangular contest would be sheer suicide. It would mean either a Conservative majority, not in the country for the pendulum has not swung back so far—but in the House, or a Conservative Ministry with the Irish Nationalists holding the balance of power. It would be well worth Mr. Asquith's while to give the Socialist-Labour faction the 30 seats they hope to win, on condition of holding the other Liberal seats secure from competition. But an accommodation of this kind would mean an alliance with Socialism, as well as with Catholicism, and some very drastic social legislation in the next Parliament. It is difficult to gauge the weight of the Moderate element in the Cabinet and it may be strong enough to face defeat rather than permit such an alliance.

We have dealt with this subject in its issues at length, partly in order to draw the attention of our readers to the issues and in hope of a great and critical election in a democratic country. The introduction of democratic institutions in India, more genuine than the present Reform Scheme, cannot be long delayed, and it will be well for those of us who think to study their working in the European country which serves as a model to others. But beyond this aspect of the elections, there is a deeper interest to us Indians in the great constitutional struggle now at hand. The abolition or limitation of the Lords' veto is a question of supreme importance to the Indian politician. When the time comes, and it is coming surely—that popular assemblies have to be established in India, the veto of the Lords will be the one instrument that reaction will use to stay reform for a long season. It is that instrument which has baffled Irish Nationalism. If it continues to exist it will baffle Indian Nationalism also. Although, therefore, Liberal and Conservative are one in their attitude towards India, every Indian patriot must watch with keen interest the result of the struggle and desire, not the success of the departing Ministry, but victory for the destroyers of the Lords' veto.

There will be found, in another column, the manly letter written by Messrs. Brailsford and Nevins jointly to the London Times, in explanation of their recent resignation of much-valued appointments on the Daily News. Incidentally the letters call attention to the very significant struggle now going on in England for the granting of the Parliamentary franchise to women. Women in England are in the position of the subject peoples in the Empire. Being to the full as well-educated and intelligent as the men, and having been made aware through journalism, literature, the modern consolidation of information, and their own essays at practical life and public work generally—of many great interests which require to be voiced, the inevitable has happened. They demand to see the end of a gross anomaly. The process of feminine emancipation must be completed.

The civic individuality of woman must be recognised. She must be empowered to vote at Parliamentary elections on an equal footing with man.

It is believed that with the enfranchisement of women a new moralising influence of immense proportions will be thrown into the scale of politics. The sale of narcotics and intoxicants, the regulation of employment, the protection of public morality, the marriage laws, are all to be interfered with to the benefit of humanity as a whole. We hope so. To us of the East with our more matriarchal institutions, the political futility of Western women, allowed to work for men but not to compete against them in the franchise, has long been a somewhat puzzling spectacle. The day may very possibly arrive, when in a nationalised India, our own women may make the same demand as these. If so, however, we can hardly imagine a similar resistance. The immense value of feminine opinion on all questions directly or indirectly bearing on the graver social interests, is self-evident to the Oriental mind. Meantime, as an Indian woman was heard to reply when approached on the subject by feminine agitators, "Our men have not yet got their votes, so we must act, not talk!"

It is the history of the movement for women's enfranchisement that makes its value for ourselves so great. Throughout the lives of the present generation, the English have been accustomed to an annual moving of Parliament on behalf of the vote for women, as regular and as ineffective as the annual budget speeches of Indian members in the Viceregal Council. The body of opinion in favour of the vote was undoubtedly growing, and indeed a time came when almost every educated English woman, apart from the politics of her family was understood to belong to it. Even the men were being won over and were accustomed to score honours in after-dinner speeches and on similar occasions by slowly and deliberately saying that a highly cultivated and intelligent woman might possibly be as well qualified for the vote as an ignorant peasant or factory hand.

Suddenly, however, within the

last few years a woman arose who had the courage to declare that all this was very pretty fooling. This woman, Mrs Pankhurst, was in earnest about the matter. It is said of her that she is not a woman, but an idea,—and that idea, votes for women. In a moment the sweet slumbers of the constitutional advance were broken. The era of violence and menace had begun. No politeness restrained these women. One remembers the news of the flag with the words "Votes for women" pushed through the grille of the Ladies Gallery in the House of Commons and waved before the astonished legislators. The signal thus given has been followed up by a hundred measures each one more unpleasant to staid persons than the last. Meetings have been interrupted. Doors have been besieged. Stones have been thrown. Officials have been pestered in their homes. Women of some of the highest families in England have been arrested for disorder and violence in the streets. The thing has in fact become so common that no one is any longer ashamed of it. It is even a trifle 'smart' to be able to speak of one's feminine relatives languishing in prison, undergoing the week of fasting and being subjected to the indignity of the stomach tube.

To the amazement of the world, however, women who had been supposed to be charming toys easily fooled by a little flattery, having no power to act and no real force at their command, were suddenly discovered to be in possession of inexhaustible courage and determination. They were proved capable of intense moral earnestness, able to give themselves over to a principle, remorseless in logical faculty and conscious of an unity of purpose which was tantamount to efficient organisation.

They are supremely inspired, but not by any means so well organised in their resistance as they might be. Anyone who has seen the speech of a Cabinet Minister interrupted by them some twelve or fifteen times, will realise how very much more trouble they could have given by concerted disturbance in many directions at once. Womanlike, they make up for their want of strategy by a reckless expenditure of heroism, and the power of martyrdom for a cause is found to grow on every bush.

The first effect of the new movement was to reveal the immense volume of constitutional opinion that already existed in favour of the enfranchisement of women. This opinion would never perhaps have become effective without the friction-edge provided by Mrs. Pankhurst's agitation, but it existed, and it included almost all that was distinguished or note-worthy among women. Fortunately, while not participating in the methods of the violent agitators, these Englishwomen have too much political good sense to fight against each other. Each party recognises the value of the other to the cause which they have at heart. The Constitutionalists constantly give public expression to their feelings of gratitude and admiration for the self-sacrifice undergone by the rival party. And if the Extremists do not say as much about the Constitutionalists, it is very evident that their silence is due, not to any repudiation of the drowsy partner, but to the fact that they deal in acts and not in words. The little party of reaction organised by Mrs Humphry Ward is just of sufficient consequence to prove that a conviction against the vote is non-existent amongst Englishwomen. The women of England must be reckoned as unanimous on the question of their own enfranchisement. The party of violence is the edge and the party of constitutionalism the blade of the movement. The two are in complete harmony and each tacitly accepts the work done for it by the other.

Now let us note the results of the work done. The agitators have used all weapons and have not hesitated to apply their political influence against the Government at bye-elections. It is true that they have to deal with an executive saturated with imperialism demoralised by the Government of subject races, and still fresh from the spectacle of the Boer War. Very few are left of those generous souls who can regard this as one more of those gallant movements of emancipation that make up the history of humanity. Very few are those who would still make sacrifices on behalf of the great ideals of impartiality and freedom for which England once believed herself to stand. Very few are seeking to eliminate the corrosive of party resentment from their own treatment of political prisoners. Yet the women have succeeded in making their own need one of the questions of the day. "They have embarrassed the Government, injured it at bye-elections and exposed its chiefs to the just ridicule of the country."

There can be no doubt that by the mutual assistance of Constitutionalists and Extremists, suffragists and suffragettes, the question of woman's suffrage will be one of the first dealt with by the next Ministry.

THE BRAIN OF INDIA.

IV.

We have stated, as succinctly as is consistent with clearness, the main psychological principles on which the ancient Indians based their scheme of education. By the training of Brahmacharya they placed all the energy of which the system was capable and which could be spared from bodily functions, at the service of the brain. In this way they not only strengthened the medha or grasping power, the dhi or subtlety and swiftness of thought conception, the memory and the creative intellectual force making the triple force of memory, invention and judgment comprehensive and analytic, but they greatly enlarged the range, no less than the intensity, of the absorbing, storing and generative mental activities. Hence those astonishing feats of memory, various comprehension and versatility of creative work of which only a few extraordinary intellects have been capable in Occidental history, but which in ancient India were common and usual. Mr. Gladstone was considered to be the possessor of an astonishing memory because he could repeat the whole of Homer's Iliad, beginning from any passage suggested to him and flowing on as long as required, but to a Brahmin of the old times this would have been a proof of a capacity neither unusual nor astonishing, but, rather, petty and limited. The many richness of an Eratosthenes or the range of a Herbert Spencer have created in Europe admiration or astonished comment; but the universality of the ordinary curriculum in ancient India was for every student and not for the exceptional few, and it implied, not a learning of many subjects after the modern plan, but the thorough mastery of all. The original achievement of a Kālidāsa accomplishing the highest in every line of poetic creation is so meritable to the European mind that it has been sought to cleave that mighty master of harmonies into a committee of three. Yet it is paralleled by the accomplishment in philosophy of Śhrīkara in a short life of thirty-three years and dwarfed by the universal mastery of all possible spiritual knowledge and experience of Śrī Rāmkrishna in our own era. These instances are not so common as the others, because pure creative genius is not common, but in Europe they are, with a single modern exception, non-existent. The highest creative intellects in Europe have achieved sovereignty by limitation, by striving to excel only in one field of a single intellectual province or at most in two; when they have been versatile it has been by sacrificing height to breadth. But in India it is the greatest who have been the most versatile and passed from one field of achievement to another without sacrificing an inch of their height or an iota of their creative intensity, easily, unfalteringly, with an assured mastery. This easy and unfading illumination crowning the unfading energy created by Brahmacharya was due to the discipline which developed sattwa or inner illumination. This illumination makes the acquisition of knowledge and all other intellectual operations easy, spontaneous, swift, decisive and comparatively unfatiguing to body or brain. In these two things lies the secret of Aryan intellectual achievement. Brahmacharya and sattwic development created the brain of India; it was perfected by Yoga.

It is a common complaint that our students are too heavily burdened with many subjects and the reading of many books. The complaint is utterly true, and yet it is equally true that the range of our studies is pitifully narrow and the books read miserably few. What is the reason of this paradox, the justification of these two apparently contradictory truths? It is this, that we neglect the basis and proceed at once to a superstructure small in bulk, disproportionately heavy in comparison with that bulk, and built on a foundation too weak to bear even the paltry and meagre edifice of our impaired knowledge. The Indian brain is still in potentiality what it was; but it is being damaged, stunted and deaced. The greatness of its innate possibilities is hidden by the greatness of its surface deterioration. The old system hampered it with study in a foreign language which was not even imperfectly mastered at a time when the student was called upon to learn in that impossible medium a variety of alien and unfamiliar subjects. In this unnatural process it was crippled by the disuse of judgment, observation, comprehension and creation, and the exclusive reliance on the deteriorating relies of the ancient Indian memory. Finally, it was beggared and degraded by having to deal with snippets and insufficient packets of information instead of being richly stored and powerfully equipped. The new system of National education seeks to undo the evil by employing the mother tongue, restoring the use of the disused intellectual functions and providing for a richer and more real equipment of information, of the substance of knowledge and the materials for creation. If it has not triumphantly succeeded, that is partly because it has to deal with minds already vitiated by the old system and not often with the best even of these, because its teachers have themselves seldom a perfect grasp of the requirements of the new system, and because its controllers and directors are men of the old school who cling to familiar shibboleths and disastrous delusions. But in the system itself there is a defect, which, though it would matter less in other epochs or other countries, is of primary importance in this period of transition when bricks have to be made out of straw and the work now done will determine the future achievement of our nation. While calling itself national, it neglects the very foundations of the great achievement of our forefathers, and especially the perfection of the instrument of knowledge.

It is not our contention that the actual system of ancient instruction should be restored in its outward features,—a demand often made by fervid lovers of the past. Many of them are not suited to modern requirements. But its fundamental principles are for all time and its discipline can only be replaced by the discovery of a still more effective discipline, such as European education does not offer us. The object of these articles has been to indicate the nature and psychological ideas of the old system and point out its essential relation of cause and effect to the splendid achievements of our ancestors. How its principles can be reapplied or be completed and to some extent replaced by a still deeper psychology and a still more effective discipline is a subject for future handling.

ANANDAMATH.

The path of the soldiers took them precisely by the road where the Brahmacharin had stood in the highway near the jungle and gazed round him. As soon as they arrived near the hill, they saw under it, on the top of a mound, a man standing. Catching sight of his dark figure silhouetted against the moonlit azure sky, the havildar said, "There is another of the rogues; catch him and bring here; he shall carry a load."

At that a soldier went to catch the man, but, though he saw the fellow coming to lay hold on him, the watcher stood firm; he did not stir. When the soldier laid hands on him, he said nothing. When he was brought as a prisoner to the havildar, even then he said nothing. The havildar ordered a load to be put on his head; a soldier put the load in place, he took it on his head. Then the havildar turned away and started marching with the cart. At this moment a pistol shot rang suddenly out and the havildar, pierced through the head, fell on the road and breathed his last. A soldier shouted, "This rascal has shot the havildar," and seized the luggage-bearer's hand. The bearer had still the pistol in his grasp. He threw the load from him and struck the soldier on the head with the butt of his pistol; the man's head broke and he dropped further proceedings. Then with a cry of "Hari! Hari! Hari!" two hundred armed men surrounded the soldiery. The men were at that moment awaiting the arrival of their English captain, who, thinking the decoits were on him, came swiftly up to the cart and gave the order to form a square: for an Englishman's intoxication vanishes at the touch of danger. The sepoys immediately forced into a square facing four ways and at a farther command of their captain lifted their guns in order to fire. At this critical moment someone wrested suddenly the Englishman's sword from his belt and with one blow severed his head from his body. With the rolling of the Englishman's head from his shoulders the unspoken command to fire was silenced for ever. All looked and saw a man standing on the cart, sword in hand shouting loud the cry of "Hari! Hari!" and calling "Kill, Kill the soldiers." It was Bhavananda.

The sudden sight of their captain helpless and the failure of any officer to give the command for defence, left the soldiers for a few moments passive and appalled. For a moment the soldiers took advantage of this opportunity to slay and wound many, reach the carts and take possession of the money chests. The soldiers lost courage, accepted defeat and took to flight.

Then the man who had stood on the mound and afterwards assumed the chief leadership of the attack, came to Bhavananda. After a mutual embrace Bhavananda said, Brother Jivananda, it was to good purpose that you took the vow of our brotherhood." "Bhavananda," replied Jivananda "justified be your name." Jivananda was charged with the office of arranging for the removal of the plundered treasure to its proper place and he swiftly departed with his following. Bhavananda alone remained standing on the field of action.

WHO?

In the blue of the sky, in the green of the forest

Whose is the hand that has painted the glow?

When the winds were asleep in the womb of the ether,

Who was it roused them and bade them to blow?

He is lost in the heart, in the cavern of nature,

He is found in the brain when He builds up the thought;

In the pattern and bloom of the flowers He is woven,

In the luminous net of the stars He is caught;

In the strength of a man, in the beauty of woman,

In the laugh of a boy, in the blush of a girl;

The hand that sent Jupiter spinning through heaven,

Spends all its cunning to fashion a curl.

These are His works and His veils and His shadows,

But where is He then? by what name is He known?

Is He Brahma or Vishnou, a man or a woman,

Bodied or bodiless, twin or alone?

We have love for a boy who is dark and resplendent,

A woman is lord of us, naked and fierce;

We have seen Him a muse in the snow of the mountains;

We have watched Him at work in the heart of the spheres.

We will tell the whole world of His ways and His cunning,

He has rapture of torture and passion and pain;

He delights in our sorrow and drives us to weeping,

Then lures with His joy and His beauty again.

All music is only the sound of his laughter,

All beauty the smile of His passionate bliss;

Our lives are His heart-beats, our rapture the bridal

Of Krishna and Radha, our love is their kiss.

He is strength that is loud in the blare of the trumpets

And He rides in the car and He strikes in the spears.

He slays without stint and is full of compassion,

He wars for the world and its ultimate years.

In the sweep of the worlds, in the surge of the ages,

Ineffable, mighty, majestic and pure,

Beyond the last pinnacle seized by the thinker

He is throned in His seats that forever endure.

The Master of man and his infinite Lover,

He is close to our hearts had we vision to see.

We are blind with our pride and the pomp of our passions,

We are bound in our thoughts where we hold ourselves free.

It is He in the sun who is ageless and deathless

And into the midnight His shadow is thrown.

When darkness was blind and engulfed within darkness

He was seated within it, immense and alone.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TIMES."

Sir,—You allowed one of us a few weeks ago to cite in your columns passages from speeches by Mr. W. E. Gladstone and Mr. John Morley which defined the attitude of the older Liberalism towards political offenders. They held that only "base and degrading crimes" could properly be visited with humiliating punishments, they denounced the forcing of prison dress and other similar indignities on Irish agitators, and produced a formidable list of precedents to show that for many generations it had been the practice of both parties to accord the honours of war to political prisoners. Mr. Herbert Gladstone, in dealing with the suffragist prisoners, persists in his unfilial reading of Liberalism. He insists on classing women who are fighting for an idea with ordinary criminals, and to the hunger strike he has now replied with the loathsome expedient of the stomach-tube. The women protested against humiliating punishments; he proceeds to make the infliction of these humiliations possible by a method which, besides being certainly nauseating and probably dangerous, is an unpardonable outrage on human dignity.

To say that the alternative is to abandon all thought of punishing these prisoners is to reason loosely. Two courses are open to Mr. Gladstone. He may release the women after five or six days of total starvation, a punishment which was thought adequate until they happened to choose the Prime Minister as the object of their demonstrations. He may also transfer them to the first division. The stomach tube is not required in order to render imprisonment possible. It is required in order to make possible punishment in the second and third divisions. We observe that some Liberals are now discovering that persons who have been guilty of violence are not political offenders. But most of our noteworthy political prisoners, from Smith O'Brien to Dr. Jameson, were the leaders in violence incomparably more formidable than anything which these women have yet attempted.

There are, we take it, two main reasons for discriminating in favour of Political prisoners. In the first place they are commonly persons of high character who possess (to use the words which Mr. W. E. Gladstone quoted from Burke) that noble sensitiveness which "feels a stain like a wound." In the second place no Government party or class can be trusted, without the check of some such tradition as this to deal fairly with its opponents. After the alternate Whig and Tory prosecutions of the seventeenth century, our forefathers had seen enough of the libertine malice of ignominious punishments. There is evidence for those who read the Liberal party Press, that in present instance the corrosive of party resentment is at work. The oldest of the Liberal dailies has circulated the baseless legend that at Birmingham a deliberate attempt was made to "assassinate" the prime Minister. Its Parliamentary correspondent has announced that on learning of the sufferings of these women in prison. Liberal members (who seem to have laughed at Mr. Hardie's honourable protest) had no room for any emotion save one of sympathy for their "great leader" in his "peril."

But the clearest evidence of this vindictive spirit is the Home Secretary's unflinching pursuit of these militant adversaries. Three of the Liverpool demonstrators who have just emerged from gaol after the misery and exhaustion of their fast are now about to be prosecuted for damage done to the prison furniture to the extent respectively of 1s, 6d., and 3d. For this they have already been punished in prison. We must say nothing that might prejudice their trial but it is legitimate to note that when the Home Secretary determined to ignore the traditional maxim De minimis non curat lex, he can hardly have failed to foresee the consequences. These women (if found guilty) will again be sentenced, will again reply by a hunger strike and will then be tortured by the stomach-tube. There can be no explanation of this pursuit save a determination to break the spirit and degrade the self-respect of women whose real crime is that they have embarrassed the Government, injured it at bye-elections and exposed its chiefs to the just ridicule of the country.

The train of cause and effect is only too clear. At the outset the Government treated the movement grew under persecution. Exasperation beget violence, and with suffering came a bravery and a spirit of self-sacrifice which no penalty can crush. The weeks as they pass are bringing us nearer to the phase of moral tragedy. To our minds the graver responsibility will fall on the members of a nominally democratic party who have turned their backs upon a gallant movement of emancipation, and, above all, on the "great leader" whose obstinate refusal to listen to the appeals even of the constitutional women has made at each repetition a multitude of converts to violence.

Lest we should seem in our strictures on Liberalism and its organs in the Press to be guilty of an inconsistency, we wish to take this opportunity of stating that, despite our warm approval of the Budget, we have resigned our positions as leaders-writers on the Daily News. We cannot denounce torture in Russia and support it in England, nor can we advocate democratic principles in the name of a party which confines them to a single sex.

We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

H. N. BRAILSFORD.
HENRY W. NEVINSON.

THE BAHRAICH POLICE CASE.

AN IMPORTANT JUDGMENT.

Mr. T. K. Johnston, I. C. S. Additional Sessions Judge of Bahraich, delivered judgment in the case of King Emperor versus Thakur Jagannath Singh, Inspector of Police, Bahraich; Wazir Ali and Jai Mohammad Sub-Inspectors; Wajid Hussain, constable clerk to the late Abdul Hasham, Luchman, Najaf Khan and Ram Kubir, constables; Ishor Nath, Thekdar and Panch of Bahrapur Estate, and sentenced them to rigorous imprisonment for seven, five and four years respectively, Wajid Hussain to eighteen months and others to rigorous imprisonment for one year while Rani Saran Bhat was acquitted. The facts of the case were that on the 12th October, Jagannath Singh made special reports to Mr. (Chamier, the Joint Magistrate, that a number of dacoits had assembled in the house of one Seligram with an intention to commit a dacoity that night in Jokalpur. Inspectors Jagannath Singh and Abdul Hakim Khan with the other accused started at about 11 p.m. for Kuti near Jokalpur where the dacoits had assembled and succeeded in effecting the capture of 13 men, while others about 15 or 20 in number made good their escape. On 31st March, 1909, Inspector, Abdul Hakim Khan made a remarkable statement to Mr. Williamson Asst. Supdt. of Police, that the affair of Kuti was pre-arranged and that the story about the dacoits was a pure invention with the result that Mr. Williamson communicated with the District Magistrate which led to the arrest of all those concerned in this game. Hakim Khan shot himself the same evening. Fifty-seven witnesses were examined for the defence. After discussing the oral and documentary evidence for the prosecution and defence the learned Judge held that the evidence defence witnesses appeared to him to show a strong contrast with that on the side of the prosecution. Important prosecution witnesses had complicated story to tell and all had been examined once before and some of them twice. Even with these advantages little result was obtained from the cross-examination. Defence witnesses, on the other hand, had broken down under cross-examination, although they had fewer opportunities. A number of entries in the police diaries had been found, which corroborated the prosecution witnesses and there was no such entries, contradicting them except those which appeared to have been made with the definite object in view.

THEFT OF DYNAMITES.

Information reached the Burdwan district police that another theft of dynamites has been committed from a colliery in Kalipahari. The exact quantity which was stolen is not yet known, but is believed to be a large quantity. The theft of dynamites in Kalipahari is not the first of its kind as there was a similar occurrence only a few months ago at Kalipahari from a colliery belonging to a Coal Company in which dynamites worth several hundred rupees were stolen in addition to several heavy charges which were stocked there for the purpose of blasting. A vigorous police inquiry is proceeding to the matter but so far without any satisfactory result.

MR. KEIR HARDIE AND THE KING.

Mr. Keir Hardie M. P. speaking at Sunderland said: "I hope it is not true that the King is intervening in this Budget dispute. So long as the King remains outside of Party politics he does no harm and can be tolerated. The moment the Throne begins to interfere in politics it is not only the Coronet of the Peer that would then go into the melting pot but the Crown would go along with it." The Labour Party demanded four things:—That every child should have plenty to eat, every strong man should work that every aged person should have comfort; that all should have freedom.

COMILLA NOTES.

The case under section 108 C. P. They appeared and filed separate written statements. The case will be taken up here on the 20th November. As no witness for the prosecution were present to-day the Magistrate has ordered issue of summons against witnesses for the prosecution. The accused were required to give fresh bail for Rs 500 each. Babus Upendra Mohon Mitra Bhudhar Das, Kamini Kumar Dutt, Fabhas Chandra Chowdhury pleaders appeared for the defence.

"DESHSEWAK" SEDITION CASE.

An appeal has been filed by Mr. R. The grounds of appeal are that the sanction was not sufficient in law for initiation of these proceedings that important questions were disallowed in the cross-examination as irrelevant and that the articles were not in themselves seditious.

THE PATIALA SEDITION CASE.

News about extradition of Jwalapershad in connection with the Patiala case is unfounded. One accused named Fulchand has been released by the police but Charanjilal who was bailed out by the Special Tribunal has not been yet released. There is no knowing when the cases will come up for hearing before the Special Tribunal.

The news is going the round of the Press that the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, Punjab has voted rupees ten thousand for the defence of the Patiala sufferers. The news needs a little correction. The matter came up before the Executive Committee and after a good deal of discussion it was decided that the general Sabha because the Executive body had no power to vote be asked to vote Rs. 10,000 in aid of the Arya Samajists at Patiala if it is found that their only crime is that they are Arya Samajists. Lala Rashan Lal Bar-at-law was appointed to watch the case on behalf of the Sabha. So it is found that the Arya Samajists at Patiala were put into prison and bundled up before the Court simply because they to the Arya Samaj the belonged Sabha will spare no pains to defend them.—Arya Patrika.

DELHI BACKSLIDING.

With reference to "Lucky Day" sales, a gentleman who has just come from Delhi, informs us that business in bideshi piece-goods has for some months past shown a decided upward tendency in the old capital. Last year we had the satisfaction to report that the piece-goods markets in that city were almost deserted. Delhi, as is well-known, is the principal emporium for imported cotton and woolen fabrics in Northern India, and the woeful condition of that great bideshi mart was a joyful sight from the Swadeshi point of view. But we are informed that a change has come over the scene. The local bideshi bazar, which for the last several years seemed to be on the verge of being shut up, has sprung into new bustle and activity. Indeed the demand for bideshi stuff has been so brisk that in some cases, the loss suffered by the wholesale and retail dealers in bideshi has been recouped.—A. B. Patrika.

THE LUCKY DAY SALES.

The Patrika writes:—Ancient the sales of bideshi piece-goods on the "Lucky Day" of the Marwari merchants which fell on Sunday before last, the "Empire" learns from a "thoroughly reliable source," that the sales amounted to about 22,000 packages. This, says the paper, is "up to anticipations all things considered." The Lucky Day transactions are considered to be the best of the progress on otherwise of Swadeshi in Calcutta and general tone of elation of the Anglo-Indian press in this connection deserves the notice of all Swadeshi workers. Interspersed in the "Empire's" article on the subject there are passages, however, which considerably qualify the hopeful outlook of bideshi business based on Lucky Day doings, for example, a few lines below the remark that the sales were "up to anticipations," we read that "it was rather a dull time, generally speaking." Further down we are told—this year's sales were very moderate owing in all probability, to the lack of ready stocks for Manchester goods. Again, "there was not much doing in arrivals (i.e., piece-goods just imported)." Finally we come upon the reassuring statement "It is said that indigenous stuffs are selling well just now." So even the "Empire" cannot make out that Swadeshi is receding and bideshi gaining ground. All that can be gathered from the figures quoted in the Anglo-Indian journals is that business in bideshi goods is perhaps not so hopelessly dull as it has been lately.

A CHANGE.

The Delhi correspondent of the Tribune writes:—The news will be read with surprise that Mr. Western, M. A. Principal of the Local St. Stephen's Mission School, has turned a sanyasi and joined the Brotherhood of the Imitation of Christ. It would be interesting to note that the brotherhood has its ardent supporter in Mr. Stokes, who recently came from America and the chief aim is to help mankind and lead a very simple life. Mr. Western, M. A., is, as our leaders are aware, the Examiner of the B. A. and M. A. papers of the Punjab University and the most learned scholar in mathematics having passed the Tripos at Cambridge and been declared as the Senior Wrangler there. Mr. Western has already left his fashionable rooms in the S. P. C. Mission House and is living in a very small room in the School Boarding House. A dhoti, a long over-garment, a rug and a matting form the necessities of his daily life. Mr. Western will remain in the school for six months more till the return of Mr. Marsh, the Principal of the School, and then leave all educational work and remain with the poor and devote his time with the masses. It is further being stated that Mr. Western will lead a very simple life and found a "Gurukul" at Kotegurh in Simla Hills, but this matter still requires verification. However Mr. Western's action is an example of true self-sacrifice and will be an eye-opener to most of the Indians. Mr. Western is already maintaining himself on six rupees a month.

POONA DEFAMATION CASE.

The District Magistrate of long, was engaged in hearing the case in which Nalkunt Waman Bhide pleader and Gan-Gangadhar Kandolikar printer and publisher of the "Bharat Bhushan" Press were charged by the Honble Mr. G. K. Gokhale with defamation. The District Magistrate in the 21st ultimo granted warrants against both who were released on bail. Apte represented Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Baptista, Bar-at-Law, from Bombay with four local pleaders defended Mr. Bhide. The second accused on tendering an apology and offering to give donation of two hundred rupees to Kuruxes Widow's Home and a similar amount of the Depressed Classes Mission the complainant agreed to withdraw the charges and accept the apology. Kandolikar was accordingly acquitted. On examination of the Hon Mr. Gokhale expressed his willingness to accept the apology. The case against Mr. Bhide was proceeded with. Complainant stated that the object of publishing the stanzas by the accused was to lower him in estimation of the public. The stanzas also imputed that the complainant was intriguing with British Government with whom he was installing himself and had brought about the ruin of Mr. Tilak who was extremely popular and his sole object was to turn the current of popular feeling against the complainant. There was not a particle of truth in what the complainant stated in this and other stanzas. The accused held the complainant as a great boaster and that he could ruin any body he liked and lastly that he had drawn the noose around Mr. Tilak's neck to let him swing. A Sub-Inspector of Police and the printer and publisher and an expert were then examined. The cross examination being reserved the case was adjourned. The application for a long postponement was opposed by the prosecution.

DAMAGES AGAINST THE "DAILY EXPRESS."

In the King's Bench Division, before Mr. Justice Grantham and a special jury an action was tried in which Lala Lajpat Rai sued the proprietors of the Daily Express for a libel contained in an article published in July, 1907, alleging that the plaintiff had submitted to the Amir of Afghanistan a plot for "the delivery of India from the British Raj." The defendants admitted that they had published defamatory matter concerning the plaintiff and tendered an apology.

The jury found for the plaintiff with £50 damages.

Plaintiff's counsel, Mr. David, said the plaintiff in May, 1907, was deported from India and the defendants said he was deported on a charge which, by their pleadings, they admitted they could not substantiate. He was sent to Mandalay without trial. On June 27, 1907, a correspondent of the Daily Express in Simla sent a letter Home which was published on July 16th. It was headed; 'Mystery of an Exile.' 'Why an arch-Indian agitator was deported.'

Mr. G. C. Nerang, Professor of English literature at Lahore, gave evidence denying that Lajpat Rai was a leader of the seditious movement, though he had advocated home rule for India at meetings at India House.

Mr. Justice Grantham is summing up said:—The plaintiff was deported by Lord Morley. No one was deported by Lord Morley. No one was more careful of the liberty of the subject than Lord Morley, and everyone had the greatest confidence in him, and he justified that confidence. The plaintiff was deported, and on the evidence they knew the plaintiff had taken part in meetings got up for the purpose of agitation. Rumours got about, and two months afterwards the defendant's correspondent in Simla sent over a report stating the reason why the plaintiff was deported. That reason was untrue, and they had to assume that there was no truth in it at all. The defendants did not justify the libel. The plaintiff wanted an apology that would rehabilitate his character.

INDUSTRIAL NOTES.

FARMING.

It is understood that the Burma Government have granted a lease of Victoria Island in the Mergui Archipelago, to a European capitalist for farming and other purposes.

OIL FIELDS.

A revision of the oil-field maps of certain India oil reserve in the Yenang-Yuang field, in the Magwe District, has recently been completed by the Burma Land Records Department.

RUBBER IN BURMA.

Eight special leases of land, covering a total area of 760 acres, have been granted by the Burma Government for rubber cultivation and stock and dairy farming in the Hantha-waddy District.

BURMA TIN.

The tin mines in South Burma are reported to have given an output of 1,887 cwts. valued at £11,015 during the year 1908. This production is above the average of that of the past five years, but is not indicative, it is said, of any real development of the industry.

A COTTAGE INDUSTRY.

The rearing of the Eri-silk worm promises, it is reported, to develop into a useful cottage industry in parts of the Madras Presidency.

INDIAN COAL FOR CEYLON.

The Ceylon Government has now ordered about 72,000 tons of Indian coal from the East India Coal Company for requirements during the next year.

CEYLON RICE IMPORTS.

Rice imports into Colombo from January 1st to October 23rd totalled nearly three million bags, or an increase of 355,472 bags, as compared with the corresponding period of last year.

HILL PADDY FROM JAVA.

The Ceylon Board of Agriculture has just received a consignment of hill paddy from Java. The paddy is to be experimented with in both wet and dry cultivation.

IRON PLOUGHS.

The Secretary of the Ceylon Board of Agriculture has just returned from a visit to Tissa, the large paddy country in the island and supplies some interesting information regarding the use of light iron ploughs in paddy cultivation. Some 4,000 acres are to be brought under cultivation by the end of November, and light iron ploughs are being used with the greatest success. Cattle are used in the absence of buffaloes, for ploughing and we are told that a pair of bulls with these ploughs can do as much as dozen pairs with native ploughs, or a dozen cattle puddling—another of the primitive local systems of cultivation. The use of the iron ploughs should be greatly extended with the success which has attended the experiments. Considerable time and labour is saved while the work is better done than when the antiquated native ploughs are used.

AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY.

The leading feature of the Department of Agriculture work in the United Provinces last year was the development of public interest in the improvement of agriculture and stock-breeding and the rise of the demand for labour-saving appliances. This increase of public interest was not without influence on the position of the subordinate service, which is now beginning to win recognition in the eyes of parents. The demand for agricultural machinery has arisen chiefly among landholders and the larger cultivators, and is in fact the effect of the rising wages of labour; but, on the other hand, it testifies to the success of the Department in winning the confidence of the people and in adapting implements to local needs. The Director of Agriculture is confident that the movement now started will make rapid progress and result in the establishment of an important implement industry in the country. The implements principally in demand at the present time are water-lifts, tillage implements, sugar machinery and miscellaneous articles. In the case of water-lifts (hand-power chain pumps for low lifts from canals and lakes) the demand was greater than the Department could meet, owing to the drought and scarcity of labour in October last year—(C. and M. Gazette).

MR. STEAD ON SWARAJ CASE.

Last Week Mr. Modak, the agent of Swaraj in Bombay who was convicted a few days ago under Sec. 124A of the Indian Penal Code, was released from jail he having served out the full term of his imprisonment. It will be remembered that the Bombay High Court, in its judgment on an appeal by the accused for revision of the finding of the lower Court confirmed the view of the lower court that the article which formed the subject matter of the prosecution, was highly seditious. The latest issue of the Review of Reviews has notable observations about the Magisterial finding in the Swaraj case. Mr. Stead is of opinion that the Magisterial judgment demonstrates to the civilised world and to Lord Morley, "the fantastic outrages on the liberty of the press which may be committed under the shelter of Sec. 124A of the Indian Penal Code." The article under charge, says Mr. Stead, is an article "the usefulness of which to all those who are anxious for the maintenance of law and order in India can hardly be exaggerated. If Mr. B. Chunder Pal, who has given proofs of his detestation of the whole evil system of terrorism had not written this article of his own motion, Lord Morley could hardly have spent a thousand rupees more profitably for the Indian Government than by paying Mr. B. Chandra Pal a fee to make so careful, so judicious, and so well-informed a study of causes which led to the apparition of the Bomb in India." The editor of the Review of Reviews pities Lord Morley at the spectacle of the former editor of the Pall Mall Gazette who was always writing papers on Ætiology of crime in Ireland, being confronted by the judicial utterance of Mr. Aston, the trying Magistrate in the said case. Mr. Stead writes "I do not hesitate to characterise this as an unwarrantable outrage upon the most elementary principles of a free press and I justify my assertion by carefully reprinting the strongest passages from the incriminating article leaving it to Mr. A. H. S. Aston to apply to the Review of Reviews if he pleases article 121A of the Indian Penal Code. And in order to facilitate his action and that of the prosecuting authority I say frankly that I publish it for the purpose of exciting discontent with his administration of the press law in order to obtain either a reform in the law or an improvement in its administration. Man ought never to be content to sit down under wrong, and the good citizen when subjected to injustice is rightly in a chronic state of disaffection. After quoting the strong passages from the article Mr. Stead thinks that it is an "earnest denunciation of bombthrowing and a grave state-manlike inquiry into the causes which led to the outburst of crime." He further says "Mr. Morley would certainly denounce this as an outrage when he was editing the Pall Mall Gazette in Forster's time. What does Lord Morley think of a decision which practically declares that any attempts to explain the origin of crime is in itself criminal? Is this the way India is to be governed the Atoms will succeed in making Englishmen as disaffected as the Indian Nationalists." Mr. Stead's objection to the Magisterial decision is so strong that in an editorial note in the same number of the Review of Reviews he observes: "If the Securaj suppressed it may be necessary to publish an Indian edition of the Review of Reviews for the purpose of allowing the non-criminal constitutional masses of our Indian fellow-citizens an opportunity of discussing problems of the first Imperial importance without the risk of being throttled by police Magistrates who cannot distinguish between an examination of the causes of disaffection and an incitement to disaffection."

THE FERRER DEMONSTRATION.

Extraordinary scenes have taken place as a sequel to those reported last week following upon the execution of Senor Ferrer, the alleged instigator of the Barcelona riots. A demonstration of sympathy with Senor Ferrer was organised in London, and a crowd of ten thousand persons with red flags marched from Trafalgar Square to the Spanish Embassy in Grosvenor Gardens by way of Whitehall and Victoria Street, and succeeded in reaching it, despite frequent charges of horse and foot police. The Embassy was guarded by a strong force of police and escaped damage, the crowd dispersing after booing loudly.

Hand-to-hand fighting occurred in the streets, missiles were thrown and sticks and umbrellas were used as weapons. A demonstration was made outside Westminster Cathedral, and a priest was threatened. The police were unable to stop the march of the rioters, and not a single arrest could be made.

The conspicuous features in Trafalgar Square on Sunday afternoon were the flag of black crepe and the white banner with a black border on which was printed in black letters the words "To hell with the murderer, Alfonso." The appearance of this last banner which was not displayed until the meeting had well advanced was the signal for loud cheering. Mr. E. E. Green, an ex-Church clergyman, who presided over the principal group read various messages including one from the Countess of Warwick. She wrote "I hope Sunday's meeting will be grand. No words are too strong to express Europe's horror at the murder of Ferrer. I wish I could be there."

Speeches of the most violent kind were delivered at the Trafalgar Square demonstration by Mr. Victor Grayson and a number of other Socialists.

Mr. Grayson declared that the shooting of Ferrer was not only the death of one great and worthy man: it was an insult to the intelligence of Europe. "I believe the price of Ferrer's life will be paid," he said, "and not long from now. If there were a head knocked off from Spain it would only serve to show that there was not much in it. If the heads of every King in Europe were torn from their trunks to-morrow it would not pay half the price of Ferrer's life. If all those heads were rolled in the dirt to-morrow they would not have one like that of Ferrer's who, by his acts as a loyal son, lost his life for the people of the world. If the Tsar of Russia had been kept out of Great Britain, if we had shut the door in his face and said 'tyrants like you stink in our nostrils,' there would never have been this murder in Spain. He referred to the Tsar as a dirty monster and concluded by saying that 'this crime would lay not at the door of the people, but at the door of King Edward the Seventh.'"

ATTACK IN THE COMMONS.

Mr. Grayson followed up his action at the demonstration by a further attack in the Commons. Mr. Arthur Henderson the leader of the Labour Party asked whether Sir Edward Grey would state what action if any was taken on behalf of the Government to prevent the shooting of Senor Ferrer by the Spanish Government without trial in a civil court.

Sir Edward Grey answered. His Majesty's Government cannot depart from the rule not to interfere or to express opinions concerning matters of internal administration in other European countries where no British subject or treaty rights are involved.

Mr. Pete Curran suggested that if the Foreign Office had used its influence to prevent the judicial murder of one of Spain's most distinguished Citizens.

"Rubbish" shouted Mr. Belloc.

Then Mr. Grayson moved the adjournment of the House to discuss it as a definite matter of urgent public importance.

The speaker helped him to put his motion into proper form.

Mr. Grayson said the urgency lay in the fact that there were now being tortured in the dungeon of Montjuich prisoners accused on charges similar to those against Senor Ferrer. He wanted them tried in a fair civil court where witnesses would be allowed on behalf of the prisoner.

Only 18 members rose to support the motion instead of the requisite 30, and leave was therefore refused. Then Mr. Grayson, exclaimed "shame, cowards," while Mr. Will Thorne is reported as shouting: "I hope those who signed the death-warrant will be sent to heaven by chemical parcel post."

Violent scenes have taken place in the Belgian Chamber, where violent speeches were made by the Socialist Deputies against the Spanish throne, and fresh demonstrations have taken place throughout Italy.

From Barcelona comes a report that the Crown Counsel who prosecuted Ferrer has been assassinated.

BRAHMACHARYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE : The true builder of the Nation.

BY S. J. REMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVARTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by Col. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras :—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad) :—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No great or service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaghai, Ceylon) :—"Brahmacharyya describes the life which Brahmachari ought to live. It contains the path of the Rishis laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture of students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. L. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."
